IN Convocation at Oxford on Tuesday next, March 4, a decree will be proposed granting books printed at the Clarendon Press, to the value of £500, towards restoring the valuable library of Toronto University, which was recently destroyed by fire. An appeal for such donations has been issued by Mr. Edward Allen, the London agent of the university, whose address is 28 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and an influential committee is being formed for the same purpose.

THE Rev. John Llewellyn Davies has been elected Hulsean Lecturer at Cambridge for the ensuing year.

MR. J. ADAM, of Emmanuel College, is engaged upon an edition of the Republic of Plato, with introduction, translation, and notes, to be published by the Cambridge University Press. The work will be in four volumes, of which the three last, containing text and notes, will be issued first. Volume i. will consist of a general introduction, dealing critically and exegetically with the structure and doctrine of the Republic; and a translation, the aim of which will be to reproduce the peculiarities of Plato's style so far as is consistent with the English idiom, laying special stress on the evolution of Plato's reasoning.

MR. SIDNEY J. OWEN, reader in Indian history at Oxford, was to deliver a public lecture to-day on "The Emperor Baber."

MR. A. G. V. PREL, as president of the Oxford Union Society, has issued to life members an appeal for subscriptions towards putting the rooms of the society into good repair. It is estimated that upwards of £2000 is needed for the purpose. The appeal states that the society has suffered somewhat of recent years through the development of college, school, and political clubs and associations; we would also add—from the luxurious provision of junior common-rooms and libraries by the college authorities.

THE University of St. Andrews will open professorial classes for the education of women in the summer of 1890. Scholarships will be awarded by public competition among intending students at the commencement of the session. The subjects of instruction will be those now taught at the university, and the lectures will be of the same character as those given during the winter session to men. They will also prepare for the L.L.A. diploma of the university. The classes will begin on May 15, and will continue till the end of July.

THE St. Andrews University and Dramatic Society gave last week three representations of the "Aias" of Sophocles in English, and of "The Midnight Watch"—a play by Mr. J. M. Morton. It was the ancient piece that "drew." The translation used was that of Prof. Lewis Campbell, who made a short speech at the matinée on Saturday afternoon. The audiences expressed their approval in a most emphatic manner.

THE Durham University Journal for February 22 prints a Latin version of Tennyson's latest Lyric, "Crossing the Bar," signed H. K.

SOME of our readers may be interested to know that the Borough Road Training College has a monthly magazine of its own, which is now in its second year. The main part consists, as it should, of college gossip; but there are also literary essays, of varying merit, from both old and present B's, as they like to call themselves. We may specially mention a series of personal reminiscences by Mr. James Runciman, which, however, lead to the rather dangerous conclusion that journalism pays better than schoolmastering. The number for January has a photographic portrait of the principal, Mr. P. A. Barnett, under whom the college has made a fresh start, and from whom yet more may be expected when the new buildings at Isleworth are occupied towards the end of the present year.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A.D. 1590.

So do they love, Aemilia and her lord,
That neither knows the other's faults at all
Save by confession; which may scarce befall,
Because some kiss anticipates the word.
Nor do their virtues larger scope afford
Of self-delight, or knowledge mutual;
Since each believes their own too weak and small
To live unaided by the other's hoard.
Thus they abide, in childlike ignorance
If either owe the other aught of ill,
Or if the one have anything of good
Except the other. Oh, most blessed chance,
More subtle-sweet than art, that hath this skill
To blend two souls in such beatitude!

OBITUARY.

PROF. LORIMER.

IN James Lorimer, Regius Professor of Public Law and the Law of Nature and Nations in the University of Edinburgh from 1862, and Lyon Clerk in the Scotch Court-of-Arms, who died in his seventy-second year on January 13, this country has lost one of its leading representatives in philosophical jurisprudence. When his chair was founded shortly after the union of Scotland with England, the law of nature was currently based on theories of natural equality and an original state of nature which had fallen very dead when, after thirty years' abeyance, the chair was revived, and Mr. Lorimer appointed to it, partly on the recommendation of Sir G. Cornewall Lewis, who had been struck by some of his earlier writings. At that time the philosophical basis which was most commonly given on the continent to law and ethics was no less abstract than the earlier one, though it took the very different form of the right asserted to the free development of our existence and nature, while on this side of the German Ocean the utilitarian theory reigned almost exclusively, whether avowed or implied in the discussion of each particular question on the ground of consequences apart from any general view. Lorimer, Scotch by birth and early education, and who had made his chief studies at Geneva, Berlin, and Bonn, was not a man to be content with particular solutions unconnected with a philosophy, or to accept a philosophy unconnected with transcendental views of man and the purpose of his existence. At the same time, he was thoroughly British in his attachment to fact—a character which could only be strengthened by his being a member of the Scotch bar and author of a Scotch law-book, although, partly from a delicate constitution, he had not very actively pursued his profession. Thus prepared for such mediation as might be possible between insular and continental habits of mind, during the twenty-eight years of his professorship—the duties of which he bravely performed till within a week of the end, though often suffering greatly from chronic liability to asthma—he poured out a flood of stimulating thought, both to his class and in his writings. The chief of the latter were Constitutionalism of the Future (1865), The Institutes of Law: a Treatise on the Principles of Jurisprudence as Determined by Nature (second edition, 1880), and The Institutes of the Law of Nations (2 vols., 1884), of which the last has been translated into French and Spanish. But he was also a frequent contributor to periodical literature, and his introductory lectures at the commencement of each academical year touched in an interesting and often novel manner on a great variety of topics. He was one of the founders of the Institute of International Law, at the meetings of which his genial character and the high esteem in which his learning and originality were held made him most welcome when his health permitted him to attend; and his reputation abroad is witnessed not only by the Transactions above mentioned, but by his honorary or corresponding membership of universities and academies in many countries, and by his having been one of the few foreigners on whom a doctorate was conferred at the octocentenary of the University of Bologna in 1888.

Deeply impressed with the indispensable conformity of all human arrangements to the facts of man and his surroundings, Lorimer pushed this idea so far as to assert a relation approaching to identity in kind between the laws of nature and those human arrangements which alone he considered worthy of the name of law. True positive law was the subject of discovery rather than of enactment.

Success in that discovery depended on recognition of every fact, not only in its bare existence but in its measure. On such recognition whole bodies of doctrine might be based: constitutional doctrines, not abruptly passing from the negation of all political rights to conferring them on a footing of equality, but apportioning them in the measure of capacity; international doctrines, founded on the plenary, relative, or partial recognition of states. And laws so discovered rested on what he called the de facto principle. Students of the professor's works will here recognise some of his watchwords. This is not the place to detail how he developed them and connected them with ontological and physiological views, or with what quaint humour and practical sagacity he often illustrated them.

It only remains to add that Prof. Lorimer took a leading part in the movement for the extension and improvement of higher education in Scotland and the adequate equipment of the Scotch universities, from its commencement in 1853; and that last year his services in that cause, in which a considerable measure of success has now been attained, were publicly recognised by a subscription for the foundation of a "Lorimer Scholarship." He has left a large circle, both at home and abroad, to whom he was greatly endeared as a man and a friend.

J. WESTLAKE.

JOHN LOVELL.

By the death, on February 20, of Mr. John Lovell, the editor and manager-in-chief of the Liverpool Mercury, a well-known figure has been removed from journalistic circles.

Mr. Lovell was born at Farnham in Surrey on November 20, 1835; and, after serving upon a Guildford paper, he became connected with several provincial journals, including the Sheffield Times and the Birmingham Daily Post. He succeeded Mr. Moy Thomas in the editorship of Cassell's Magazine in 1868, but relinquished this position in the following year to take up the management of the Press Association newsagency. This he resigned in 1880 to go to Liverpool.

In years past Mr. Lovell was a frequent contributor to the magazines. He translated the Nouveau Robinson Suisse of Stahl. He was the author of Free Trade Facts and Fair Trade Fallacies; Municipal Government in Liverpool—in which charges of mismanagement were urged against the local authorities; The Great Trial of Free Trade v. Fair Trade—wherein the entire question is discussed in all its bearings under the similitude of an action-at-law; and The Land Question, an elaborate review of the English system. Mr. Lovell was also a popular lecturer, dealing with Molière, Hood, wit and humour, or the general question of the inspiration of the Bible. Speaking without the aid of notes, his lectures were marked with a degree of spontaneity that was quite refreshing. In quoting an illustrative passage from the author under review he invariably relied upon his memory, which never failed him. A clever imitation by Mr. Lovell of the style of Barham in the Ingoldsby Legends is included in a volume of humorous poetry recently issued in the "Canterbury Poets" series.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE January number of The American Journal of Psychology contains two principal articles, one on "The Insanity of Doubt," by Dr. P. C. Knapp, and one on "The Effect of Fatigue on Voluntary Muscular Contraction," by Dr. W. P. Lombard. The first is an interesting résumé of the facts classified by French alienists under the head "Folie du Doute." It is questionable, however, whether this is the best expression for describing such varied phenomena as morbid timidity, a craze for calculating (when the patient feels compelled to count or multiply everything), aimless metaphysical and other questioning, and so forth. One misses in the paper a careful psychological analysis, there being not the slightest reference to the psychology of normal doubt. The second paper gives the results of a carefully planned series of experiments. According to these, the protracted use of a muscle is attended with alternating periods of fatigue or loss of power and recovery. By ingenious variations of the experiment the writer thinks he has shown that the periodic exhaustion is not peripheral, and not in the highest motor centres, forming the substratum of the initial will-impulse, and must, therefore, be referred to lower central mechanisms. The essayist does not seek to bring this recurring temporary fatigue into relation to more permanent conditions which are marked by the subjective accompaniment, sense of fatigue. In addition to these two articles, there are three "minor contributions." Prof. Jastrow sends the fruit of some good work in the Laboratory of Experimental Psychology at the University of Wisconsin. This is partly a further illustration of the operation of the psycho-physical law (not quite so new as the writer seems to claim—who, one fancies, has not looked at his Fechner very recently), and partly a fuller development of the position already established by previous experiments of the writer that each sense has its own standard of space-measurement, and that when we try to translate from one domain into another—e.g., that of tactual into visual judgment by trying to draw a line, by help of the eye, of the same length as that first previously applied to the arm, and judged of exclusively by the skin sensibility, there is a considerable error. Fechner, by-the-by, experimented in this direction also. His results, which differ materially from those of Jastrow, might have been referred to. Of no less interest is the editor's first contribution to the "History of Reflex Action," which is a scholarly and timely bit of work. Perhaps, however, the paper of most general interest in the number is the third minor contribution on "Children's Lies." This is an account by the editor of the result of a questioning of about three hundred city children of both sexes by lady teachers. From this it would seem that children are much more troubled about the matter of veracity than older people are apt to believe, and that they have curious devices of their own for allaying the qualms of conscience, as, for example, by adding: "I don't think so" or equivalent words to themselves at the moment of lying; or (as in one case) of periodically repeating series of "nots" like "aves" so as to neutralise the effects of previous lies. The article exhibits the civilised child as something midway between a fetish worshipper and a skilled casuist. Considering the enormous difficulties of such an investigation the results seem decidedly encouraging; and it were to be wished that "accomplished and tact-full lady teachers" in England would follow up this extra-official examination of children's minds.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LOTZE OR TEICHMÜLLER.

Glasgow Feb. 24, 1890.

It is but too true that in my Natural Religion I attributed Lotze's definition of religion to Teichmüller. Several of my German readers and critics have called my attention to it; lately also a member of the late Prof. Teichmüller's family. I have made the only amende honorable that I could make, by altering the passage; and in the German translation of my book, now passing through the press, the mistake is corrected.

F. MAX MÜLLER.

MARY FITTON AND "THE DARK LADY" OF SHAKSPEARE'S SONNETS.

London: Feb. 8, 1890.

Mr. Tyler identifies "the Dark Lady" of Shakspeare's Sonnets with Mary, a daughter of Sir Edward Fitton of Gawsworth in Cheshire. His main reasons for this identification are (1) that Lord Herbert had had amatory relations with Mary Fitton between 1598 and 1601, the period he allows for the Sonnets; and (2) that her effigy, on her mother's coloured tombstone still preserved in Gawsworth Church, amid the kneeling children chiefly fair, has dark hair and eyes. He further supports his theory by Kempe's Dedication of "The Nine Days' Dance to Norwich" to Mrs. Anne Fitton, Maid of Honour to Elizabeth; because, as her sister Anne had been sometime married to Newdigate, and was not then a maid of honour, Kempe (or the printer) must have made a mistake in substituting Anne for Mary. This, he thinks, connects her to some extent with Shakspeare's company. But, on the other hand, Earwaker's Oshere, in the pedigree of the Fitton family, names Anne maid of honour, as well as Mary maid of honour.

There is no doubt of Mary's relations with Lord Pembroke. One suggestive little point Mr. Tyler does not mention. When, in November 1599, Herbert left London to see his father, and by repeated attacks of ague, the attractions of the Salisbury Race, and other causes, did not return till March 22 (Easter Eve), 1599-1600, we find in the Sydney papers, under date January 12, 1599-1600, "Mrs. Fitton is sicke, and gone from the court to her father's." And again, Lady Sydney "visited Mrs. Fitton that hath long been here sicke in London" (February 21, 1599-1600). I read this as a sign of a genuine attachment, and believe that Mary was too much in love with Lord Herbert (or his prospects) ever to have been in the habit of flirting with married play-actors. Lord Herbert's return to London was evidently satisfactory to both queen and court. In June, 1600, there were great doings there, at the marriage of the "other Lord Herbert" to Mrs. Anne Russel, the queen's maid of honour. "Lord Herbert of Cardiffe" led the bride, and there was a great masque in "the name of the Muses that came to seeke one of their fellows" (see Chamberlain's letter to Carleton). Rowland Whyte described with admiration their beautiful dresses, and their hair loose about their shoulders.

"Mrs. Fitton led, and went to the Queen, and wooed her to dawning; her Majestie asked what she was. 'Affection,' she said. 'Affection?' said the queen. 'Affection is false,' yet her Majesty rose and dawninged."

These two young people, then at the height of their glory in June, were in sad trouble in the spring of the following year. Mary had been born in 1578, and was then twenty-two years of age. Herbert had been born in 1580, and was thus twenty. In January his father died, leaving him Earl Pembroke, but also, unfortunately, a royal ward, as he would not attain his majority until April 8. The queen was his godmother as well; and she evidently was not inclined to bear the sins of her god-children, because in March, when Mary "had a son which was dead" (see Carew Letters), Earl Pembroke was in prison at the Fleet. There he was straightly examined, and confessed his fault, but was as determined against marriage as he had hitherto proved in all the negotiations his friends had previously made for him (see Sydney Papers). He was relieved from this more severe form of punishment; but he was confined to his own house in London, banished from court, forbidden to travel abroad, a heavy sum exacted for his wardship, and, finally, he was exiled to his country house in Wiltshire, where he apparently remained during the life of the queen. Now, this seems to suggest that Elizabeth held Sir Edward Fitton's view of the case; that "he had beguiled her," that is, with promise of matrimony. Her father's letter to Lord Cecil on the matter says:

"I can say nothing of the Erle; but my daughter is confident in her chance before God, and wisheth my Lord and she might but meet before in different scenes. But for myself I expect no good from hymne that in all this tyme hath not shewed any kindness. I count my daughter as good a gentlewoman as my Lord is though the dignity of honor be greater onlye in him which hath beguiled her, I fear, except my Lord's honesty bee the greater vertues" (May 16, 1601).

I think that Queen Elizabeth, who had evidently loved Mary, believed her story, and therefore treated Pembroke harshly to suggest marriage as a reparation.

Mr. Tyler argues from Kempe's Dedication that Mary was rather familiar with that class of actors. But he does not notice a short address in the middle of the work (p. 18), in which Kempe says, "Faire Madame, to whom I too presumptuously dedicate my idle pages." This, taken with the allusion to the "Blackamore" in the Dedication, certainly suggests that even if Mary Fitton had black eyes and hair (of which we have no testimony to support the witness of the tombstone, which might be allegorical), she was not so "coloured ill" or so unlovely "that a lover might say he lied when he called her fair." My reading of the Dedication is this: When Mary Fitton danced to the Queen, and said she was "Affection"—she should have said "Terpsichore," which explains at once the queen's reply, "Affection is false," and Kempe's Dedication of the records of his famous "Dance to Norwich." Probably Kempe had been called to court to teach and arrange dances in the revels; and, finding her the most important person near the queen, the most skilful in dancing, the most affable in manner, the most liberal in purse, he had dedicated his little book to her as a compliment, not without a view, doubtless, to future liberality. But there is nothing against her character in this.

Taking into consideration the hard usage meted out by Elizabeth to Earl Pembroke, evidently for "renouncing all marriage," and the probability, therefore, that Elizabeth sided with her favourite Mary, we should not be surprised if she were restored to royal favour. I think this was actually the case; because in the Sydney Papers, under date December 28, 1602, Rowland Whyte writes in the same part of his letter usually reserved for the doings of Lord Herbert and his friends:

"Mrs. Mary, upon St. Steven's Day, in the afternoon, dawning before the Queene two galliards, with one Mr. Palmer, the admirabest dawner of this time, both were much commended of her majestie, then she dawninged a corante."

Taking for granted that Mary's name was too well-known to require "Fitton" to be appended, this entry gives colour to my opinion on the favourite's skill in dancing, and her reinstatement in the queen's favour.

It is true Mr. Tyler shows from Lord de Tabley's Oshere Genealogies that Mary afterwards had two daughters by Sir Richard Leveson; but the morals of the time must be judged according to different standards from ours. After her ambitious hopes had been twice deceived, Mary Fitton contented herself with a husband of lower degree, Captain Polwhele, to whom her great-uncle left his best damascene sword and his best horse to show "my love to him and his now wife" (March 31, 1608). She lived to marry a second husband, Captain Lougher. But her life up to June, 1600, gives no trace of anything to support even a possibility that she had any relations with Shakspeare, and we have nothing whatever to do with her subsequent feelings and actions. We know Clarendon says that "Earl Pembroke was the most universally beloved of any man in his time, but he was much given to women." We can well imagine his charms winning Mary's heart; and, feeling her position at court at least quite equal to his, she might have really believed in his good faith. When the terrible awakening came to her—how much more a woman has to suffer from imprudence than a man, and how much farther she has to fall, even when that fall is broken by the affection of her friends—doubtless the whole future current of her life and feelings were changed. We cannot argue from events after that date to events before it; and I certainly refuse to believe this bright girl to be the "evil angel," the "despair," the "woman coloured ill," and, above all, the woman who must have been married before the sonnets began. If Shakspeare had really addressed the Sonnets to the "dark lady," they belonged to her; and we cannot imagine that Mary Fitton, just then settling down to a quiet married life, would in 1609 have permitted a publication that would have darkened all her after-conduct, and, at the same time, cleared Pembroke. Nor would Shakspeare, on the other hand, had he ever felt them, had he ever written them to her, have been so unmanly and ungenerous as to have permitted them to have been so published.

I believe the lady of the Sonnets is yet to be found. At the same time it is a point worth noting that among the poems of Earl Pembroke preserved in MS. by Christian, Countess of Devonshire, and published by her in 1660, there are many lines suggestive of Shakspeare's Sonnets; some upon "Dark Hair and Eyes," upon Constancy, Separation, Love, and Death. One is rather suggestive:

"TO HIS MISTRESS, ON HIS FRIEND'S OPINION OF HER.

"One with admiration told me
He did wonder much and marvel
(As by chance he did behold ye),
How I could become so servile
To thy Beauty, which he swears
Every ale-house letice bears. . . .
Then he frames a second motion
From thy revolting eyes,
Saying such a wanton motion
From their lustre did arise,
That of force thou couldst not be
From the shame of women free.
Then he blames the work of Nature
'Cause she framed thy body tall," &c.

It is more than possible that young Pembroke had a second flame even then. No one would have wondered at his attraction to a court-favourite like Mary Fitton; no one would have thought him disgraced by marrying her; no one could have termed her ambitious love "foul pride"—least of all Shakspeare; and to read the Sonnets through her life can surely lead only to false conclusions.

CHARLOTTE STOKES.

THE DATE OF THE RUTHWELL CROSS.

Yale University: Feb. 1, 1890.

If the date of an ancient inscribed monument is to be determined by the evidence of language alone, the procedure is manifestly the same as in the case of a manuscript. If we found a number of eleventh-century forms in a manuscript, then, though other forms might clearly belong to the sixth century, we should be warranted in dating the manuscript not earlier than the eleventh century. Of this character, for example, is the reasoning of Dr. Sweet in his Oldest English Texts (p. 3):

"The supposition of a later scribe having retained the older spelling and forms unchanged is untenable; if Epinal were a later copy of a much older glossary, we should expect either a mixture of older and later forms, or else a consistent modernisation, as in Corpus."

The principles which apply to the dating of a manuscript, and, for obvious reasons, of an inscribed monument as well, are then, if the evidence of language alone be considered, as follows:—

1. The date will be not earlier than that of the latest linguistic forms, provided these are evidently not interpolations, nor so few and doubtful as to awaken the suspicion that the evidence has been obscured by mere chance, as, for instance, that an important letter has been omitted through oversight.

2. The occurrence of earlier forms, though in considerable number, does not invalidate such evidence of lateness as has been mentioned, since these earlier forms may have been introduced into a late copy either accidentally or intentionally, while it is impossible that late forms should have been introduced into an early document.

Let us now apply these principles to the language of the inscription on the Ruthwell Cross, with the view of seeing whether any light can be thrown upon its date. To do this we must compare the forms with those of documents the date of which is already better ascertained. Some of these are: Caedmon's Hymn, circa 737 (Sweet, Oldest English Texts, p. 148); Epinal Glossary, 600-700 (ib., pp. 2-3); Corpus Glossary, early in the eighth century (ib., p. 3); Vespasian Psalter, first half of ninth century (ib., p. 184); Lindisfarne Gospels, circa 950 (Keat, Preface to Mark, p. xi).

Some of the marks of lateness in the Northumbrian documents are: (1) loss of final n in the infinitive of verbs (O.E. Grammar, § 363); (2) substitution of final e for æ (cf. Dieter, Ueber Sprache und Mundart der ältesten Englischen Denkmäler, § 50, 53, 62); (3) substitution of final ed for id in the weak verbs of the first conjugation (cf. Dieter, 50); (4) loss of final n in the oblique cases of weak masculine nouns, accompanied in some cases with a change of the preceding vowel. This is regular in the Lindisfarne Gospels, but is not yet found in the Vespasian Psalter (Zeuner, § 60); (5) loss of final n in the ind. pret. plur. of verbs. This is only sporadic and very rare in the Lindisfarne Gospels, and apparently does not occur earlier, Sievers going so far as to deny its occurrence in Northumbrian (O.E. Gram. § 364, 2 note). That it does occur is shown by clioþpado, Luke 23, 21, for example.

Comparing the forms of the Ruthwell Cross inscription with these tests in their order, we note:

1. The final n of the infinitive, which is retained in Caedmon's Hymn and the Vespasian Psalter but has disappeared in the Lindisfarne Gospels, is here lost: būgehwiða, stige. In the Leiden Riddle, cnyssa occurs, side by side with hátan; but this text is very corrupt, and we know nothing definite concerning either the age of the composition or of the manuscript.

2. Final æ, though retained in several words (darste, blōde, hweb-æ, hincæ, &c.), has given place to e in darste, wīlde, fore, iðre.

3. The earlier participial ending id, as found in demid, Bede's Death Song, and in bistēmid, Ruthwell Cross, l. 9, has yielded to ed in gīdræfed, l. 14.

4. Loss of final n, and change of vowel, is found in gīlgu, l. 2.

5. Side by side with the preterites ālegdun, bīhealdun, gīstōddun occur bismærædu and kwōmu. These latter, if they are the result of phonetic decay, and not due to an error of the sculptor, are clear proofs that the inscription is to be referred to a later period than that of the Lindisfarne Gospels.

If the method here adopted is a valid one, and if the dates assigned to the other texts are approximately correct, it will be evident that the inscription on the Ruthwell Cross is at least as late as A.D. 950, when the interlinear gloss of the Lindisfarne Gospels is supposed to have been written, while certain indications, such as that under the fifth head, would point to a still later date.

This conclusion may now be compared with those of the scholars who have previously examined the subject. Stephens (Run. Mon., pp. 405 ff.) refers it to the year 680 or thereabouts; his arguments are summed up by Sweet (Oldest English Texts, p. 125) and by Bugge (Studien über die Entstehung der nordischen Götter- und Heldensagen, Brenner's translation, p. 494, cf. p. 44). Sweet (l. c.) says: "All that the language teaches us is that the inscription cannot well be later than the middle of the eighth century." Bugge substantially agrees with Sweet (Studien, pp. 495-6). Sophus Müller, in the Aarbøger for nord. Oldkynd, 1880, pp. 338 ff. (cited by Bugge, pp. 44-5, 496), will not allow that it can be earlier than 800, and is strongly inclined to believe that it should be assigned to the closing years of the tenth century. To this opinion he is led by a consideration of the character of the ornamental sculpture; and it will be seen that this conclusion, and that reached by an independent investigation of the language, are mutually confirmatory. In view of the ancient forms which the text undoubtedly contains, some may hesitate to accept this view; but it would seem that, in order to its refutation, it would be necessary to overthrow the principles upon which all competent students of living languages are agreed.

EARLY SCHOLARS OF TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.

Trinity College, Dublin: Feb. 20, 1890.

Will you oblige me by stating that the list of scholars of this College in 1612 which I have, in my History of the University of Dublin, stated to have been noticed by Dr. O'Donnovan in a memorandum book of Luke Chaloner in the College Library, was communicated to me by Dr. W. J. O'Donnovan, M.R.I.A., F.R.Hist.S., last May. I had previously consulted the MS. in question; but this list escaped my notice, and, but for Dr. O'Donnovan's kindness in directing my attention to it, it would have been unknown to me.

JOHN W. STUBBS.

ABERCROMBY'S "TRIP THROUGH THE EASTERN CAUCASUS."

1 Salville Row: Feb. 20, 1890.

My attention has been called to the fact that the title of "Dr." has been bestowed on me by the reviewer of the Hon. J. Abercromby's recent book of travels in the Caucasus in the ACADEMY of February 15. I ought to say that I have no claim whatever to it.

I may, perhaps, usefully add that there is no need (as your reviewer suggests) to search for the results of Dr. G. Radde's journeys in the Eastern Caucasus in Russian Transactions. They have been published in Petermann's Mittheilungen, or in a separate work, Die Chewsuren und ihr Land (Cassel: 1878), and are full of interest.

The Epistle to the Hebrews. The Greek Text with Notes and Essays. By Brooke Foss Westcott. (Macmillan.)

(First Notice.)

THE Epistle to the Hebrews furnishes a good landmark for the progress of New Testament exegesis in England during the last few years. At the beginning of the decade just completed the only books available for ordinary students were the two general commentaries of Alford and Wordsworth, with Dr. Moulton's careful edition in Bishop Ellicott's series, and the translations of Delitzsch and Tholuck. To these were soon added Dr. Kay in the Speaker's Commentary (1881), whose results, though obtained at first hand, represent rather an extreme of conservatism. Next came in 1883 two smaller editions by Archdeacon Farrar and Mr. F. Rendall. Both were scholarly pieces of work: the former might be said to express intelligently the average current views of the Epistle; the latter took a line which was independent and original, but not free from crotchets, and it covered the ground less completely. More recently there has appeared another popular commentary, by Dr. A. B. Davidson, for its size and price one of the very best theological handbooks with which I am acquainted—a close grappling with the thought of the Epistle, by a singularly strong and candid mind. Now the series is fitly crowned by this full and elaborate edition of Dr. Westcott's, which will, no doubt, take its place along with his previous editions of the Gospel and Epistles of St. John, among the classics of every theological library.

A classic it really is, alike in scale, thoroughness, and accomplished scholarship. The merits of Dr. Westcott's commentaries are well known, and need not be enlarged upon. It is clear that every verse has been thought over and thought over again, not only in connexion with the rest of the Epistle, but with all the light that is thrown upon it by other parts of the Bible. Dr. Westcott does not burden his pages with references to modern writers, though it is clear that he has read at least the best of them. At the same time, a special feature in the edition is the judicious selection of quotations from patristic and mediæval commentaries. One of these by Herveus Burgidolensis ("of Bourg-Dieu or Bourg-Deols in Berry"), who died in 1149, Dr. Westcott may be said to have discovered. He quotes more frequently from that attributed to the African bishop Primasius, but without discussing its authorship. It may be worth while to observe in passing that something was said on this subject in a "programm" on Primasius by Dr. J. Haussleiter (Erlangen, 1887). Dr. Haussleiter himself only arrives at the negative result that the commentary on Hebrews is not by Primasius. He notices the fact that it has been printed not only as a work of Haymo of Halberstadt († 853), but also under the name of Remigius of Rheims († 533), while the editors of the Maxima Bibliotheca Patrum were more disposed to refer it to his namesake of Auxerre (c. 830), or of Lyons († 875). It would be a pretty problem to track out the origin of this commentary. We need to know more about these buried workshops of Biblical study. If the so-called Primasius did nothing else, it would at least show how superior the Latin language is to all others for commenting.

The application of highly trained scholarship to the Epistle will probably never go further than Dr. Westcott has carried it. The hand of the commentator is also guided by spiritual insight; and we can see throughout his anxious desire to build up on the basis of Scripture a system of Christian theology which shall be really applicable to modern times. In this latter respect I should be obliged to predict for the commentary a considerable, but not quite complete, success. Valuable and helpful as Dr. Westcott's writing always is, there is an indefinable something which prevents it from taking hold of the general mind in the same way as (e.g.) Bishop Lightfoot's. The main defect is no doubt a want of clearness. But it is not easy to say in what that want of clearness consists. Dr. Westcott is always scholarly and always careful, but he is fond of using a particular class of abstract terms which seem to me to elude the grasp when one tries to attach to them a definite meaning. Here, for instance, is a summary where, before all things, clearness was necessary, and where—making all allowance for one's own dulness—it does not seem to be attained:

"Speaking generally, then, λειτουργία marks the fulfilment of function in regard to the claims of a higher life; λατρεία, the service of perfect subjection to a sovereign power; διακονία, the ministry of appointed action."

I confess that to me the Greek words convey a more tangible idea without any comment. In part, one feels that it is the very straining after "the higher life" and the wish to put things into relation to it which has stood in the way. Dr. Westcott would succeed better if he were content to creep a little nearer the ground. At the same time, I should be most reluctant to press this criticism. I know too well how hard it is to fit words to things, and how long one has to wait for the happy formula; the writer may think himself fortunate to whom it comes at all. I gladly admit, too, that even in this matter of the discrimination of synonyms Dr. Westcott is often pointedly successful.

"ἀπολείπεσθαι is used from the point of sight of those who have gone away; καταλείπεσθαι of that which retains its original position" (p. 93).

"In ἀναφέρειν (to offer up) we have mainly the notion of an offering made to God and placed upon His altar, in προσφέρειν (to offer) that of an offering brought to God. In the former the thought of the destination of the offering prevails: in the latter that of the offerer in his relation to God" (p. 197).

"ἐμφανής is the general opposite to 'invisible,' as φανερὸς is to indistinct" (p. 272).

"As distinguished from τέλος, the end as a definite fact, συντέλεια expresses a consummation, an end involving many parts" (p. 275).

"The idea of ἀνίημι is that of losing hold so as to withdraw the support rendered by the sustaining grasp; that of ἐγκαταλείπω of deserting or leaving alone in the field of contest, or in a position of suffering" (p. 432).

"θυσιαστήριον is characteristically the altar of God, and βωμός the altar of idolatrous or false worship" (p. 453, where the exceptions are duly noted). The account of ἅγιος and δοσιος, though containing much that is good, seems to me more mixed:

"To speak broadly, δοσιος refers to character and ἅγιος to destination . . . the general opposite of ἅγιος is 'profane' (βέβηλος); the general opposite to δοσιος is 'impious,' the standard being the divine nature manifested through men" (p. 194).

The last clause is not only rather baffling, but I fail to find a sufficient ground for it. Primasius comes out well in his distinction of δοσιος, ἀκακος, ἀμλαντος: "Sanctus in interiore homine; innocens manibus; impolluto corpore."

In connexion with this question of synonyms attention may be drawn to some weighty words in the Preface (p. vi.):

"Some perhaps will think that in the interpretation of the text undue stress is laid upon details of expression; that it is unreasonable to insist upon points of order, upon variations of tenses and words, upon subtleties of composition, upon indications of meaning conveyed by minute variations of language in a book written for popular use in a dialect largely affected by foreign elements. The work of forty years has brought to me the fullest conviction that such criticism is wholly at fault. Every day's study of the apostolic writings confirms me in the belief that we do not commonly attend with sufficient care to their exact meaning. The Greek of the New Testament is not indeed the Greek of the classical writers, but it is not less precise or less powerful. I should not, of course, maintain that the fulness of meaning which can be recognised in the phrases of a book like the Epistle to the Hebrews was consciously apprehended by the author, though he seems to have used the resources of literary art with more distinct design than any other of the apostles; but clearness of spiritual vision brings with it a corresponding precision and force of expression through which the patient interpreter can attain little by little to that which the prophet saw. No one would limit the teaching of a poet's words to that which was definitely present to his mind. Still less can we suppose that he who is inspired to give a message of God to all ages sees himself the completeness of the truth which all life serves to illuminate."

This is no doubt in tacit antithesis to the view most prominently represented in Prof. Jowett's commentary on St. Paul's Epistles and also to some extent in Dr. Hatch's Essays in Biblical Greek. Speaking for myself, I should be inclined on the whole to side with Dr. Westcott. The workings of the brain are subject to a multitude of influences—many of them rather of feeling or association than of conscious thought—which are too rapid and too subtle to be fixed in propositions as they arise, but which may possibly be traced by means of study and reflection. Dr. Westcott is, I think, right in claiming that a poet may mean more than he is himself conscious of meaning, though I should have thought it a rather sanguine estimate to expect everybody to admit this. Usage goes before the philosophy of usage; and there are floating unformulated laws which determine the choice of expression, although the reader himself may have no conscious apprehension of them. In secular matters we should call this "instinct"; and there is also a religious instinct derived from the central principles of revelation.

The truth of a position such as Dr. Westcott's must be tested by its application to the facts; and the appeal must be to the common sense of the lay mind as well as to professed theologians. If, without any forcing, the results commend themselves as consistent and satisfactory, they may be taken to have received sufficient verification. And, speaking generally, I believe that this verification will not be denied to them.

I hope in a subsequent article to give some account of the leading features in Dr. Westcott's conception of the Epistle.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RAWLINSON'S "HISTORY OF PHOENICIA."

Athenaeum Club: Feb. 22, 1890.

Having very little time to devote to the perusal of periodicals, I only to-day became acquainted with Prof. Sayce's criticism of my History of Phoenicia in the ACADEMY of January 4.

It is not my habit to notice criticisms, for which I generally feel greatly obliged; but in this instance I feel bound to correct a misapprehension, and consequent misrepresentation, which, if accepted as true, would seriously reflect upon me as a writer. I am represented as having entirely neglected "the classical work of Movers," which is "not only not quoted in my notes, but is not even mentioned in the list of authorities at the end of the volume." Now, Movers is not quoted in the notes—first, because, if quoted at all, he must have been quoted on almost every page; and secondly, because, as his work is out of print and very difficult to procure, it seemed a doubtful advantage to the reader to refer him to it. And the omission from the list of authorities at the end of the work necessarily follows on the omission from the notes, since the list is one of "authors and editions quoted in the notes." But, in the preface to my work, which Prof. Sayce can scarcely have read, Movers is given the post of honour.

"His elaborate work," it is said, "collected into five moderate-sized volumes all the notices that classical antiquity had preserved of the Religion, History, Commerce, Art, &c., of this celebrated and interesting nation."

And among the works to which I acknowledge myself indebted, either for materials, or illustrations, or both, the very first mentioned is that of Movers.

On the other hand, I must admit my ignorance of the Geschichte der Phönizier of Pietschmann; but as that work is still only "appearing," and as mine was completed in May of last year, my ignorance is, I hope, excusable. "Non omnia possumus omnes." We cannot all read, as Prof. Sayce appears to do, all the books that appear each year on archaeological subjects.

In conclusion, let me thank Prof. Sayce for his criticisms, with the one exception to which I have adverted.

GEORGE BAWLINSON.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Zoological Society has just issued to subscribers The Zoological Record for 1888 (Gurney & Jackson), being the twenty-fifth volume of this invaluable publication. As for the two previous years, the general editor is Mr. Frank E. Beddard, prosector and Davis lecturer to the society. As there is no continuous pagination to the volume, we may thus summarise the contents:—List of abbreviated titles of Journals, pp. xxxv.; General Subjects, recorded by J. Arthur Thomson, pp. 34; Mammalia, by R. Lydekker, pp. 64; Aves, by A. H. Evans, pp. 95; Reptilia and Batrachia, by G. A. Boulenger, pp. 28; Pisces, by G. A. Boulenger, pp. 30; Tunicata, by Prof. W. A. Herdman, pp. 5; Mollusca, by W. E. Hoyle, pp. 82; Brachiopoda, by W. E. Hoyle, pp. 6; Polyzoa, by W. E. Hoyle, pp. 11; Crustacea, by Cecil Warburton, pp. 30; Arachnida, by R. Innes Pocock, pp. 28; Myriopoda, by R. Innes Pocock, pp. 6; Insecta, by D. Sharp, pp. 327; Echinodermata, by Oswald H. Latter, pp. 16; Vermes, by P. Chalmers Mitchell, pp. 31; Coelenterata, by W. E. Hoyle, pp. 34; Spongiae, by O. H. Latter, pp. 10; Protozoa, by C. Warburton, pp. 22; and Index to New Genera, pp. 17. The whole, therefore, amounts to about 820 pages of closely-printed matter, which may be obtained for a subscription of £1.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE Committee appointed to take measures for establishing a new Oriental Translation Fund have passed the following resolutions:—

"(1.) That the old name of Oriental Translation Fund should be continued as the name of the proposed new society.

"(2.) That a preliminary list of two or three works in the following languages should be prepared, showing what works should be recommended for immediate and early translation:—Chinese, Sanskrit, Hebrew, Arabic, Persian, Pali, Japanese, Turkish, Armenian, Russian, Tibetan, Cingalese.

"(3.) That the works to be translated should in the first instance be strictly confined to those of historical value.

"(4.) That, in addition to annual subscriptions, it is desirable to start a reserve fund of £5000 to form a basis for the new society to work upon."

Promises of donations to this fund can be forwarded to F. F. Arbuthnot, Hon. Secretary, 18, Park Lane, Piccadilly.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, Prof. Sickel, of Vienna, was elected a foreign associate in the place of Cobet; and M. de Lasteyrie, an ordinary member in the place of the late Pavet de Courtaillé.

Correction.—In Dr. Owen C. Whitehouse's letter in the ACADEMY of last week, entitled, "A Babylonian Word ammatu," on p. 137, last line, for "Menius" read "Thenius"; and on p. 138, line 21, for ḏḏn read ḏḏn.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.—(Monday, February 10.)

PROF. BABINGTON, vice-president, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. W. Bateson on "The Perceptions and Modes of Feeding of Fishes." In the course of observations made at Plymouth and elsewhere it appeared that the majority of fishes are diurnal in their habits, and seek their food by sight; but that a minority are almost entirely nocturnal, and hunt by scent. To the latter class belong Protopterus, akates and rays, the rough dog-fish, sterlet, eel, conger, rocklings, loaches, soles, &c. These creatures remain buried or hidden by day, but career about at night in search of food, returning to their own places at dawn. If, while they are thus lying hid, food or even the juice of food-substances is put into the water, they come out after an interval and search vaguely, without regard to the direction whence the scent proceeds. Some of the animals (rocklings, sterlet) have special tactile organs, in the shape of barbels or filamentous fins with which they investigate their neighbourhood, while others (conger and eels) feel about with their noses. None of the fishes which hunt by scent seem able to recognise food by the sense of sight, even though it be hanging freely before their eyes. The mode of feeding of the sole is peculiar. When searching for food its skin is more or less covered with sand, which renders it inconspicuous when moving on the bottom. This sand adheres to mucus, which is probably exuded when the smell of food is perceived. The sole seeks its food exclusively on the bottom, creeping about and feeling for it with the lower side of its face. If a worm is lowered by a thread until it actually touches the upper side of the head of a sole, the animal is still unable to find it, but continues to feel for it on the sand. There is, however, no reason to suppose that the sight of these fishes is deficient. A rockling at Plymouth had already learnt to come out to be fed if anyone came near the tank, though it still did not recognise a worm swimming in the water. Particulars were given of the various iridial mechanisms which occur among fishes. This investigation was undertaken at the instance of the Marine Biological Association, as a preliminary step towards improving the supply of bait. The experience gained suggests that a bait for the south coast, where conger and akate are chiefly caught, could be made by extracting the flavour of squid or pilchard and compounding it with a suitable ground-substance. Though few practical experiments were made, it was found that an ethereal extract of Nereis or herring, for example, greatly attracted some of these fishes.

ARISTOTELIAN SOCIETY.—(Monday, February 17.)

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. J. S. Mann read a paper on "The Distinction between Society and the State." Some difficulties were noticed attending the application to history of the antithesis first formulated by Hegel, but partially anticipated by Fichte. Society, it was argued, was not composed of clearly distinguishable classes, and tended to the effacement rather than the perpetuation of class distinctions. Nor were State and Society ever coincident in area. The antithesis was derived from the political situation in Germany early in the present century. Its value consisted in applying working conceptions to the sociologist, similar to those of abstract political economy. The Hegelian conception of the State was regarded as obviating certain difficulties respecting the rule of the majority, which arose from treating a State as a mere aggregate of atoms. Though the line between State and Society could only be settled by experience, there were occasions when, either for convenience or for the protection of its members, it was desirable for the State to undertake economic functions usually assigned to the sphere of Society.—A discussion followed.

HELLENIC SOCIETY.—(Monday, February 24.)

SIDNEY COLVIN, Esq., vice-president, in the chair.—A paper was read from Mr. Ernest Gardner on "Children in Greek Sculpture of the Fourth Century." Mr. Gardner described and published a very interesting fragment of a stele found at Lerna, and now in the museum at Argos, which presents us with a portrait of a boy whose name is given in an accompanying inscription as Cephisodotus. This portrait so closely resembles the head of a boy recently found at Paphos, and now in the British Museum, that the two heads must belong to the same age and school. Some archaeologists had attributed the Paphos boy to the Ptolemaic age; but as the date of the Cephisodotus stele is certainly the fourth century, we must now allow it to be of the time of the Praxitelean school. Mr. Gardner showed that at that time children were not always conventionally rendered, but sometimes with an approach to naturalism.—Mr. Arthur Evans cited a gem signed by Phrygillus, with a child driving a hoop, of about the age of Cephisodotus, and giving boyish proportions.—Mr. Farnell read parts of a paper on "Works of the Pergamene Style," in which he first gave an account of his researches among the miscellaneous sculptures from Pergamon now in Berlin, whence, no less than from the great altar, we should form our idea of Pergamene school; and secondly discussed a number of works in various museums which show traces of the influence of that school.

FINE ART.

THE ROYAL SCOTTISH ACADEMY.

DURING the past year the Royal Scottish Academy has been subjected to severe and persistent criticism in the public press and elsewhere—criticism that has arisen out of the application made by the body for a new and revised Royal Charter, to take the place of that by which it was constituted in 1838. For the most part this criticism has been anonymous; and many of the strictures passed upon the constitution and management of the Academy were unjust and misleading, the result in some cases of the personal animosity of those beyond its pale, or—at best—of an ill-informed desire for the welfare of art in Scotland. At the same time, it can hardly be doubted that there was some reason for complaint, that there was some ground in fact for the impression which was abroad that the Academy—after the way of men and things that have outlived the struggles of their youth and the vigour which these struggles bred—was hardly straining every nerve to do the very best that could be done for the things of art. Especially it was objected—and not without reason—that the yearly exhibitions had somewhat decreased in attractiveness, that, at any rate, the interest manifested in them by the Edinburgh public was less than it had once been.

In the Royal Scottish Academy exhibition which is now open, there is not wanting the clearest evidence that the criticism to which we have referred has borne fruit; in particular the younger members of the Academy are, without doubt, bestirring themselves, and insisting that the body to which they belong shall progress with the advancing movement of the times. Several wholesome changes have, this year, been introduced—changes which have already benefited the general appearance of the exhibition, and which, if persisted in, will benefit it yet more in the future. Of these the most important is the judicious introduction of a higher standard of excellence in works admitted for exhibition; and this—which has led to a very considerable diminution in the total number of the pictures on the walls—is, we understand, to be followed up next year by a reduction in the number of exhibits which each of the Academicians and Associates has hitherto had a right to send. In the exhibitions of recent years the average of works annually shown has averaged fully a thousand. This year only 738 are hung; and, in consequence, the visitor is relieved of the distraction of such numerous works as in former years were placed in positions so elevated as to be practically invisible for purposes of examination, and which, if they could have been seen, would have been quite unworthy of study.

Among the figure-pictures by Edinburgh painters, the "Voltaire (incognito) at the Café de Procope, listening to the criticism of his play of 'Sémiramis,'" by Mr. G. Ogilvie Reid, one of the more recently elected Associates of the Academy, has attracted—and deserved—much attention. It is a work of large size and great complexity; and the various groups that it contains have been rendered and combined with a vigorous force of handling, and, especially, with a dramatic feeling—a perception and seizure of vividly appropriate gesture and expression—which one too rarely finds in the work of figure-painters practising in Scotland. Mr. R. McGregor and Mr. J. Lochhead both show village subjects of some importance; but a more striking work of the kind (like these, upon rather foreign lines) is the "Schoolmates" of Mr. James Guthrie—a picture thoroughly delightful in its quiet truth of lighting, in the tender veracity with which the children's heads have been painted, and in quietude and thorough rightness of its colouring, which slides softly from tint to tint, like music "that's sweetly played in tune."

Mr. J. H. Lorimer is well represented by his two London pictures of last year—the "Lullaby" and "Pot-Pourri"; and from Mr. J. T. Ross we have a bold and striking effort to realise an effect of vivid sunset light streaming through the intricacies of trembling leaves upon a pathetic parting of lovers—a soldier with his lass, upon whose lap a cluster of fuchsia lies crimson like blood, and seems to prefigure some tragedy impending in the future. Various excellent rustic subjects of figures in harmonious landscape surroundings come from Mr. T. Austen Brown; and Mr. Hugh Cameron, in addition to portraits—one of which, at least, is notable for its delicacy—has a most refined and exquisite picture of "Little Bait-Gatherers" on the shore. As usual, Mr. Robert Alexander heads the animal painters, showing a freely-touched, harmoniously-toned rendering of "Setters," and a group of "Favourite Mares and Foals," the property of the Duke of Portland, excellent in the spirit of its handling and its fine sense of atmosphere.

In landscape the exhibition is, as usual, strong; and we doubt whether among the work of any of the London painters we could find more exquisite and truly artistic rendering of the last delicacies, the most subtle refinements, of landscape-tone and colour that are presented by the best works by Mr. Lawton Wingate, Mr. W. D. McKay, and Mr. W. McTaggart, upon the walls of the exhibition we are now considering. Admirable qualities of sky-painting are attained by Mr. J. C. Noble in various of his works now shown; and, in the sky and middle-distance of "The Mill on the Tyne," Mr. R. Noble exhibits the finest work of his we have yet seen, though here the foreground is less successful than the rest of the picture. Mr. James Paterson sends a brilliant landscape which he titles "The Happy Valley"; and Mr. E. A. Watton shows to advantage in this department, as also in the Water-Colour Room, where he is represented by a striking picture of a girl in an orchard.

Among the portraits, Mr. W. McTaggart has potent colouring, and strong, interpretative bust-work in his "Moss Roses," a group of mother and child; Mr. George Reid appears at his very best in three of the most important works that he sends, of which "Sir Robert Menzies," in Highland costume, is perhaps the finest—a full-length, wonderfully spirited and dignified in pose, in which the painter has found an admirably picturesque subject, and has treated that subject worthily.

As usual, the examples of local talent are supplemented by a few works from London. The chief of these are the "Marriage de Convenience—After," and the smaller "Her First Dance," of Mr. Orchardson; the "Last Rose of Summer," of Sir John Millais; various rather yellow and "forced" portraits by Mr. Pettie; and that striking and well-known Chantrey Fund picture of Mr. J. M. Swan, "The Prodigal Son."

LETTER FROM EGYPT.

Assouan: Feb. 9, 1890.

THIS letter ought to be headed "The Destruction of the Ancient Monuments of Egypt." The English public has recently been induced to take a mild interest in the preservation of the remains of one of the oldest civilisations of the world, and it has been felt that our present position in Egypt ought to bring with it a certain amount of responsibility for their safe keeping. A year and a half ago a society was formed for the protection of Egyptian antiquities, the only practical result of which has been the imposition of a tax of 100 piastres upon every person who wishes to visit the great monuments of Upper Egypt. The tax was nominally imposed with the laudable object of protecting the monuments; but although more than £1000 was raised by means of it last year, not a farthing of the money seems to have been applied to the purpose for which the traveller fondly hoped it was intended. The temples of Denderah, Abydos, Esneh, and Edfu are neither better nor worse protected than they were before—unless it be that the temple of Abydos is no longer so well defended from the inroads of boys and beggars as in the time of Prof. Maspero. But the newly-cleared ruins of Luxor are allowed to become the refuse-heap of the villagers; no attempt has been made to enclose Karnak; and at Medinet-Habu the "guardian," instead of asking me for my official permit, asked me for baksheesh—the first time a "guardian of the antiquities," appointed by the museum, has ever ventured to make such a request of me.

If this were all, however, I should not have thought it worth while to draw attention to the characteristically Egyptian mode in which the traveller is made to pay for the protection of monuments which are not protected. Unfortunately the recent efforts of the government seem likely to end in there being no monuments at all to preserve. The traveller has paid his piastres, and the monuments for the preservation of which he has paid them are being rapidly destroyed. More havoc has been wrought among them during the last three months than during the whole of the last half-century. The famous tombs of Beni-Hassan have been hopelessly mutilated, the curious bas-reliefs of Tel el-Amarna have been hewn from the walls, and the cartouches have been cut out of the tombs of the Sixth Dynasty at El-Bersheh. It is, however, in the well-known "Tomb of the Colossus," and its immediate neighbourhood, that the hand of the destroyer has been most ruthless. The floor of the tomb is strewn with the fragments of the paintings and hieroglyphs with which its walls were once adorned. The hunting scene, carved in delicate relief on a stone at its entrance, and interesting on account of certain figures in it being drawn according to the modern rules of perspective, has been wantonly smashed to atoms. Just below the Tomb of the Colossus was another and smaller tomb of the XIIth Dynasty, the walls of which were covered with inscriptions in a perfect state of preservation. It is pitiable to enter it now. Of a large part of the text nothing remains but a hasty copy made by myself four years ago. Even the tablet of Thothmes III., at the entrance of the quarries near the tombs, has not been spared; it has been defaced beyond recognition. The work of destruction has been carried out in order to provide the dealers of Ekhmim and Luxor with fragments of inscribed stone which they may sell to tourists.

But it is not only the dealers who are thus allowed to destroy tombs like those of Beni-Hassan which are supposed to be under the charge of salaried "guardians"; the work of blasting the historical rocks of Assiout still goes on merrily, and a tomb which was discovered there when I last visited the place is already partially quarried away. The VIth Dynasty tomb at Qasr-el-Syâd, with its important paintings and texts, described by me in the ACADEMY some years ago, has fallen a victim to the quarry-men; and the old quarries of the Gebel el-Tûk, with their curious Greek and demotic inscriptions, are now in their hands. The Ptolemaic temple of Toud, eight miles only south of Luxor, with its uncopied texts, is fast disappearing, Mr. Insinger tells me. When I saw it eight years ago it was in a comparatively perfect condition. It is evident that whatever inscriptions there are above ground in Egypt must be copied at once if they are to be copied at all.

So far I have not myself done much in the way of hunting out or coping new texts. Throughout the month of January the winds were so persistently strong that it was pleasanter to let the dahabiah drive before them than to face a cloud of dust or sand on shore. At the northern end of the Gebel Abu-Feda, however, I found some Greek tombs, besides another with the name Pha-i-ya above it in Cypriote letters, and a short Karian text. At Tel el-Amarna we came across some potsherds with hieratic inscriptions upon them, as well as fragments of pottery of the same colour and make as the fragments discovered by Mr. Petrie at Tel el-Gorob and inscribed with the same characters or marks. The discovery confirms Mr. Petrie's belief that the characters would be found at Tel el-Amarna if the mounds there were properly searched. It also confirms my belief that the origin of the characters is to be sought in the hieratic forms of the Egyptian hieroglyphs. I hope to enter more fully into the subject on a later occasion.

A little to the north of Negâdeh, we stopped at the village of Neylet Tûkh, as I had been told that antiquities were to be met with in the neighbourhood. About two miles inland, and beyond the cultivated land, we found a site of an old city, with four early rock-cut tombs above it, and the ruins of a Coptic monastery to the north. The tombs, which had once been painted, had lost all traces of ornamentation; but my companion, Mr. Robertson, picked up a terra-cotta stamp on the site of a fortress which overlooked the old town. The stamp bears the cartouche of Ast-m-kheb the consort of Ra-men-kheper, who was high priest of Amen in the age of the XXist Dynasty. Two and a half miles to the south is the site of another town shown with Roman and Coptic pottery. I was shown there a large stone sarcophagus of the Roman period which has lately been disinterred by the fellahin.

Since leaving Luxor, in company with Mr. Wilbour, we have visited some quarries near Debbabieh and opposite Gebelén, which were discovered by M. Daressy last year. He found in them an inscription of a king who calls himself Nesi-Ba-(n)-tatni, the Smendes of Manetho, who headed the XXist Dynasty. The inscription sheds a welcome light on an obscure period of Egyptian history. It was re-copied by Mr. Wilbour, while I re-copied another hieroglyphic text on a tablet in a neighbouring quarry. I also copied some Greek inscriptions which had been noticed but not copied by M. Daressy. They are dated in the reigns of Alexander and Antoninus Severus, and give us the names of some local deities as well as of the place in which the quarries are situated. To the south of Debbabieh are a number of tombs which M. Grébaut has excavated; south of these again is a tomb of the XIIth Dynasty, where I copied what remains of the paintings and text. Our only new discovery, however, has been an isolated sandstone rock, south of El-Qab, which was quarried in old times and is adorned with some curious sculptures, among them that of the god Bes, in a new form.

I must not forget to mention that, both at Abydos and Qurnah, vases have lately been found like those discovered by Mr. Petrie at Tel el-Gorob, which in form, ornamentation, and colour, are identical with the so-called Mykenæan vases of the first style. At Abydos they are found along with vases which resemble those found in the prehistoric tombs of Cyprus. It would be important to know with what Egyptian objects these vases are associated. But, unfortunately, the excavators in each case were natives, whose labours are profitable rather to the tourist than to the archaeologist.

A. H. SAYCE.

[On Tuesday last, February 25, a question was asked in the House of Commons by Mr. Howarth concerning the mutilation of monuments in Egypt, as described by Col. Ross in the ACADEMY of February 8. To this Sir J. Fergusson, under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs made the reply, "No such information has been received by her Majesty's Government; but inquiry will be made of Sir Evelyn Baring."

We may also mention that the Times of February 21 contains a letter from Dr. Jex Blake, complaining of the mutilation of the tomb of Knum Hotep at Beni Hassan, and adding that he was informed by his dragoman that "the outrage was committed, within the last three months, by a German."—ED. NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MRS. ALLINGHAM, who has long been an associate, was on Thursday of last week elected a full member of the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours, being the first woman to attain that rank. At the same time, Mr. Samuel J. Hodson was elected a member, and Mr. O. Napier Hemy (of the Institute) an associate.

The following have been elected associates of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers, in view of the exhibition which will open next Monday in the gallery of the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours, Pall Mall East: Messrs. A. W. Bayes, W. Boucher, C. F. Robinson, and F. S. Walker. This exhibition will be notable as including some typical examples of Rembrandt; and the society hopes in the future to add to its annual exhibitions similar specimens of the work of the great masters of etching, in fulfilment of its original design of refusing painter-like qualities into all forms of the engraver's art.

ANOTHER interesting exhibition to open next week is that of the collection of pictures brought back from Japan by Mr. Alfred East, at the Fine Art Society's, in New Bond Street.

THE veteran, Mr. Hine, will send several important drawings to the forthcoming exhibition of the Royal Institute. The two, perhaps, which are destined to attract the most attention record the painter's vision of a storm at Brighton, and of a great stretch of that country of the Downs which Mr. Hine has spent half his life in painting.

THE great sale of the season at Christie's will unquestionably be that of the Perkins collection of pictures, removed from Chipstead. These were to have been sold at the Hotel Drouot several months ago, but it was subsequently decided that they should be offered in London. An illustrated catalogue had already been prepared, and a French art writer had discoursed, in a preface, upon the contents and excellence of the wares which were to pass under the auctioneer's hammer. We trust that the plates—though they are not particularly admirable works of art—may yet be utilised for the benefit of the English collector, in the English catalogue. The Perkins treasures consist, to no small extent, of Dutch pictures. Ostade, Teniers, Terburg, Metsu, and Jan Steen, are represented, it may be, sufficiently; and there is at least one Hobbema which enjoys a great reputation. The date of the dispersion of the Perkins cabinet has not, we believe, as yet been announced.

THE STAGE.

"CLARISSA" AT THE VAUDEVILLE.

THE new "Clarissa" has distinct merits. It is interesting. I am glad to have seen it. But I cannot, in holding forth on piece or performance, emulate the hysterics of a certain daily newspaper. At the same time, one or two of the charges that have been brought against it by the less continuously gushing appear to me little deserved. The production is creditable to everybody who is concerned in it. But I doubt if, six months hence, we shall be found reckoning it among the triumphs of the Vaudeville management.

As regards Mr. Buchanan's part in the affair, it has, it seems to me, been one of greater difficulty than when it was his business to dramatise Tom Jones and Joseph Andrews. The interest of Tom Jones is, half of it, in action; the interest of Joseph Andrews is, half of it, in adventure. But the interest of Clarissa is psychological, and Mr. Buchanan's play is not psychology. He is prevented, by the conditions of the theatre, from showing us the infinite and almost imperceptible stages by which the heroine is led to that which, in common parlance, is described politely as her "ruin." Will she be seduced? Or will she never be seduced? Will Clarissa yield? Or will Clarissa elude the pursuer, charm he never so wisely? We ask these questions through page after page of the romance—through sheet after sheet of that voluminous correspondence which the brain of Richardson imagined. At the theatre, this matter must be settled more promptly. And the elaborate analysis of motive and feeling which the eighteenth-century novelist permitted himself has perforce to be abandoned for a drama faithful enough, as Mr. Buchanan claims, to the main incidents—even to the main spirit; but from which, inevitably perhaps, something which was the source of the novel's interest has, to a great extent, gone.

But though many thoughtful readers must feel this to be the case, the dramatist may reasonably get credit for the judgment and dexterity with which—the conditions of stage representation being what they are—he has handled the theme. And, so far from blaming him for the very prominent introduction of Philip Belford and of his sister Hetty—who, as M. Zola and other novelists of l'hérédité will be glad to note, go to the devil each in his own way—we ought, I think, to see at once that Mr. Buchanan was right in conjecturing that the contest between Clarissa's chastity and Lovelace's persistence could not alone occupy the stage—that there was need of some other interest. And he has introduced this new interest with a great deal of skill. Philip Belford and Hetty are, to my mind, thoroughly sympathetic ne'er-do-wells. Philip, it is true, stooped low; but he stooped with genuine regret. Even in his cups, he is inoffensive. And you cannot be very hard on Hetty, wild and kind-hearted—nay, devoted at need. Without these characters, the play would have lacked much of value that it now possesses. Mr. Buchanan, when he chooses, can invent so well, is it not almost a pity that he should continue chiefly to adapt? To finish with his part in the present production, let it be said that the language of the drama is vigorous and direct; and, as a whole, sufficiently, without being obtrusively, old-fashioned. Here and there, there are lapses. I may, of course, be wrong; but, from the lips of Lovelace, the phrase "a coup de théâtre" sounds a little modern.

In the dramatisation of what is not only intellectually a very great, but as regards mere bulk also, an immense novel, there are likely to figure a far larger number of characters than if it had been left to the dramatist to invent his own fable. And, as the drama proceeds, several of these characters are wont to be dropped upon the way. In "Clarissa," after the first act, we see nothing more of three people not unimportant "in their day"—Clarissa's father, Clarissa's brother, and a wealthy neighbour, Mr. Solmes, who is a pertinacious suitor for Clarissa's hand. Mr. Solmes, the most important and designedly the most entertaining of the three, is so well played by Mr. Cyril Maude that we are sorry to lose him. As a suitor, Mr. Solmes has nothing to recommend him but self-confident piety and a great estate; but as a person of the drama, the pungency and quaintness of Mr. Cyril Maude make him unquestionably welcome. Lovelace is enacted by Mr. Thalberg—who is good, but not quite good. I mean that while his natural gifts, and a long and successful experience—as I hear—in the provinces, have removed him entirely from the ranks of the incapable—have made him to some extent an accomplished actor—he yet is hardly the ideal Lovelace. The ideal Lovelace would be even more fascinating, even more persuasive, even more forcible, and at need more violent. Mr. Blythe is amusing as a farm-bailiff, very accessible to argument when argument takes the form of cash; and—to name a tiny character part—the part of the watchman, in his momentary appearance, is well played and looked by Mr. Wheatman. But no character in the piece is more thoroughly filled out to the utmost of its narrow possibilities than is that of young Aubrey—a friend of Lovelace's—looked and played by Mr. Frank Gillmore with admirable lightness and elegance. Next to Lovelace—whom I have already discussed—the two most important men's parts are those played by the brothers Thorne. Mr. Thomas Thorne exhibits very skilfully and sympathetically the humours and the regrets of Philip Belford—the unwillingness with which a man whose moral force, whose power of resistance, is for the time gone joins in the plot against Clarissa; and, again, the tenderness and courage with which, at need—summoning back again the best that is in him—he prepares to defend her. The part offers to Mr. Thorne a large measure of variety; and the actor avoids monotony, and is earnest and convincing. A variety necessarily more obvious is attained by Mr. Fred Thorne, in a part that is wholly of comedy. Captain Macshane, a soldier from beyond the Border, assumes the garb of a divine in order that he may do Lovelace the service of performing a mock marriage. And, at the wedding feast, he lifts up his voice in a song which strikes Clarissa as not exactly suited to the ecclesiastical character. The low or the eccentric comedy of Mr. Fred Thorne is always acceptable; but he is seen to greatest advantage in a part that makes some demand upon feeling likewise.

Mr. Buchanan's "Clarissa" is anything in the world but a one-part piece; and Miss Winifred Emery, as the heroine, may be justified, perhaps, in being judicious and tender, rather than actually great. Her very visible intelligence, her real delicacy of perception, and some physical gifts which are as apparent, will carry her far; and her performance already is admirable, though it is not perfect. In what ought to be the great scene of the third act, I wanted her to be bigger. Here the climax of emotion was surely reached, but somehow I was not aware of it. That Miss Emery looks the character need hardly be said; and, as one would expect from her, she executes her conception generally with subtle touches. Nothing, for example, could be better than her first indications of definite suspicion when Clarissa is in reality in Lovelace's house, while it pretends to be that of his imaginary kinswoman. And earlier than that—in the first act—Clarissa's hesitation is well expressed by her. Very "maidenly"—if one must give her behaviour its usual phrase—is her behaviour to Lovelace. In the fourth act, Miss Emery is to be greatly commended for sparing us the worst of what Bacon speaks of as "the dolours of death." For Clarissa, indeed, the sweetest canticle is "nunc dimittis." And Miss Emery understands that there must be pathos rather than terror. Of the other ladies who are engaged in the piece, let it be mentioned that Miss Mary Collette is satisfactory in the small part of a young country woman; that Miss Hanbury—who is almost a débutante—acts a good-hearted, impulsive, Covent Garden market girl with naturalness, freshness, and happy assurance; and that in the really considerable character of Hetty Belford, Miss Banister is forcible as well as picturesque. Of scenic effect there is throughout the piece enough and not too much. The market scene is very prettily suggested, but the necessary business of the play never waits by reason of a superfluity of "supers."

STAGE NOTES.

THE report that Mme. Sarah Bernhardt may come to London much earlier than usual this year is at present unconfirmed, and would seem to be inconsistent with the gratification of the latest desire of the actress—which is, so it seems, to appear as the Virgin Mary, in a Passion play.

A DRAMATISED version, by Miss Charlotte Morland, of Mrs. Lovett Cameron's "Devout Lover," was brought out at a matinée the other day without any great result.

MISS JESSIE BOND, we are sorry to hear, has had to take a longer rest than she had at first intended. She is, at present, "out of the bill" at the Savoy.

MR. CHARLES WYNDHAM is expected to return to England during the month just beginning; but the career of "Our Boys," at the Criterion Theatre, will not be checked immediately.

THE Poel and Berlyn "Drawing Room Comedies Company"—which has twice appeared before Royalty—have added several pieces, both light and serious, to their season's programme—of which the most noticeable to the student is "The King and the Countess," an exquisite episode in the play of "Edward the Third," which some authorities suppose to be the work of Shakespeare. In the part of the Countess of Salisbury, Miss Mary Rorke will be seen. Messrs. Rawson Buckley and Herbert Basing, and Miss Rosina Filippi—one of the most inventive of our younger comedians—and Miss Muriel Wylford—a young actress of real distinction—and others besides these are advertised as available to appear in one or other of the pieces which Messrs. Poel and Berlyn are wont to present.

"HAMLET" will be produced at the Globe on Thursday next, March 6, and will be played every Thursday and Friday evenings till further notice. Mr. F. R. Benson will play Hamlet, Mrs. Benson Ophelia, Mr. Charles Cartwright (who has been absent from the stage for some time through illness) the King, Miss Ada Ferrar the Queen, Mr. G. R. Weir the Gravedigger, Mr. Ross Laertes, and Mr. Otho Stuart Horatio.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. HENSCHEL's series of concerts came to a close last Thursday week. A programme including Mendelssohn's "Sootch" Symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried" Idyll, and the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal," was calculated to draw persons of different, nay opposite tastes; and the hall was, indeed, crowded. There is no need to enter into detail. The performances were remarkably good, and Mr. Henschel seemed to have saved the best till the last. He has announced another series of six concerts for next season, to commence on November 6. We have already expressed our opinion that the future has good things in store for Mr. Henschel.

Mr. E. German's Overture to "Richard III." was given last Saturday at the Crystal Palace. This work formed part of the music written specially for the production of Shakespeare's "Richard III." at the Globe Theatre just a year ago. The overture is effective. The opening "Gloster" theme has a bold character, and naturally plays an important part in the piece. The second theme, named after the unfortunate prince, contrasts well with the former. Mr. Manns gave a spirited performance of the Overture, and the public signified their approval by calling for the composer. Lady Hallé played Spohr's "Scena Cantante" with all possible charm and delicacy. She was also heard in Handel's Sonata in A. A splendid rendering of Schumann's splendid Symphony in C gave unbounded satisfaction. Miss Lucile Hill, a soprano singer, made her début in the aria, "Hear ye, Israel," from "Elijah." She has a good and well-trained voice, but was apparently not at her ease. She had more chance to distinguish herself in the vocal waltz from Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette," set down for her later in the programme.

The students of the Royal Academy of Music gave a concert at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon. Mr. Edwin Houghton, a pupil of Mr. Shakspeare, made a favourable impression. He has a tenor voice of good quality, and it has been well trained. He sang, "Come, Margarita, come," from "The Martyr of Antioch." Miss Grace Henshaw displayed skill and taste in a not very edifying Liszt solo. Mr. Gerald Walenn, Mr. A. E. Dyson, and Mr. B. P. Parker may be commended for their string playing in Mendelssohn's Quartet in B minor. The female choir sang, with much effect, pieces by Reinecke and Mendelssohn. A carefully-written, if not particularly striking, Allegro for 'cello and pianoforte was played by Mr. C. H. A. Gill, and the composer, Mr. R. Steggall.

Last Monday evening Brahms' interesting Sonata in D minor (op. 108) for pianoforte and violin, was interpreted by Dr. Joachim and Miss F. Davies. The latter played with great earnestness and feeling. She was also heard to advantage in some short Mendelssohn solos. Mr. Norman Salmond sang songs by Handel and Schumann, accompanied by his wife, with marked taste and intelligence. The concert opened with Beethoven's Quartet in B flat (op. 18, no. 6), and concluded with Mozart's pianoforte Trio in E.

The Bach Choir gave a concert at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening, and the whole of the programme was devoted to the works of the great master whose name the society bears. Fashions may come and go, but time only increases the power and majesty of Bach's music. It is true that the mannerisms of a bygone age are felt here and there; it is also true that the composer had his less inspired moments. But when the spirit moved strongly within him, then he produced works which will surely endure as long as the art of music itself. The Bach Choir produced for the first time the fine old cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"—another jewel from an almost inexhaustible mine. The whole of this work is based upon the extremely ancient chorale, "Christ ist erstanden," said to date from the twelfth century. The words are by Luther, and many a detail shows how Bach strove to reveal their meaning and heighten their effect. The performance was somewhat rough and uncertain. The orchestra was at times too loud, and the male voices compared unfavourably with those of the ladies. The sopranos, indeed, form the best part of the choir: their tone is rich, and their attack firm. Miss Liza Lehmann sang "Ich will dir mein Herze schenken," from the St. Matthew Passion. A better understanding between vocalist and conductor would have been an advantage; for it seemed, indeed, as if the piece had not been rehearsed. The oboe d'amore obligato parts were played by Messrs. Lebon and Smith. The Concerto in D minor, for two violins, with Dr. Joachim and Mr. R. Compertz as interpreters, was, of course, one of the special features of the evening. The audience would willingly have heard the lovely Largo over again. The performance of the difficult unaccompanied Motet in eight parts, "Der Geist hilft unser Schwachheit auf," was excellent. In this noble work, learning and inspiration go hand in hand. Dr. Joachim played in the most masterful manner the C major Sonata. While admiring the great artist who can interpret this music with so much skill and power, one is lost in astonishment at the genius displayed by Bach merely in the technical writing for the instrument. Dr. Joachim was recalled three times. The concert concluded with the Cantata, "Wachet auf," given last year by the Bach Choir. It is founded on an old Chorale used by Mendelssohn in his "St. Paul," and it is treated by Bach with the utmost grandeur. The choral numbers are deeply impressive. The two duets for soprano and baritone, with their lovely themes and quaint style, form a striking contrast. Both are exquisite; but the second, aptly described by Spitta as a "spiritualized love duet," is the more fascinating. They were exceedingly well-rendered by Miss Liza Lehmann and Mr. Plunket Greene. In the first the violin obligato part was played by Dr. Joachim; in the second, the oboe obligato by Mr. Lebon. The two short but effective tenor recitatives were carefully rendered by Mr. Branscombe. The choir sang with great spirit. Dr. Stanford conducted the whole of the concert. The performance of the first two numbers of the opening Cantata was spoilt by late comers making their way to their seats. It is a pity that the doors are not rigorously shut during performance. Bach's music requires to be listened to in quiet reverence. The sounds of music of a light kind proceeding from a lower room in the building during this work was another painful distraction. A Chorale and a Quadrille do not mix well together. Something ought to be done to put a stop to this; for double music is often heard during the Popular and other concerts.

Miss Geisler Schubert and Miss Fillunger gave their second Chamber Concert at Prince's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon. In Beethoven's Trio in B flat (op. 97), Miss G. Schubert's crisp playing and clear phrasing were displayed to advantage. The reading was a good though not a powerful one. The lady's associates were Herr Straus and Mr. Whitehouse. Miss G. Schubert played two of Schubert's Impromptus, one in F minor (op. 142, no. 1), the other in A flat (op. 90, no. 4), with commendable charm and feeling. But her best performance was Brahms' Rhapsodie in G minor (op. 79, no. 2). There was character about her conception of the piece, and her tone and technique were alike admirable. Miss Fillunger sang songs by Beethoven and Schubert. There was a large and appreciative audience.

EDWARD STANFORD'S RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED and ENLARGED.
STANFORD'S LONDON ATLAS of UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY. Quarto Edition, containing 46 Coloured Maps, carefully drawn, and beautifully engraved on Steel and Copper Plates, and an Alphabetical Index to the Geography of the World. Half-morocco, cloth sides, gilt edges, 80s.
Size, when shut, 13 in. by 15; weight, 4 lb. 8 oz.

"We have already commented on the pains which appear to have been taken to work up the maps to the latest date; we may add that they are excellent specimens of engraving and colouring, that the great difficulty of marking mountain ranges, &c., without obscuring the names, has been excellently surmounted, and that we have detected very few misprints. As what may be called a medium atlas for general use, something between the cheap but meagre school collections and the elaborate but rather costly and unwieldy library atlases, the 'London Atlas' deserves hearty recommendation."—Saturday Review.

CHARTS of the CONSTELLATIONS, from the North Pole to between 85 and 40 Degrees of South Declination. By ARTHUR COOTMAN, F.R.A.S. 36 Charts, each 30 by 22 inches, printed on drawing paper, and supplied folded in half in a Portfolio, or flat if preferred. £2 net per Set. As soon as 200 Sets are sold the price will be raised to £3 8s., and as a very few copies only now remain early application is desirable.

With one exception (Hydra) each Constellation is
third of an inch to a degree, and all the Double Stars in the Catalogues of the two Struves are shown.
(Detailed Prospectus, with Specimen Chart, free on application.)

"Surely this is the very luxury of stellar cartography, for, from the days of Bayer downwards, nothing has appeared comparable with this splendid series of charts now before us for the special purposes for which they are intended. It has been reserved for Mr. Cootman to produce what, for employment with instruments having motions only in altitude and azimuth, is as near perfection as any delineation of the celestial concave on a plane surface is ever likely to be. The amount of labour expended on this splendid work must have been enormous. No astronomical library or observatory of any pretensions can afford to be without it."—English Mechanic.

A TRIP THROUGH the EASTERN CAUCASUS, with a Chapter on the Languages of the Country. By the Hon. JOHN ABERCROMBY.
Demy 8vo, cloth, with Maps and Illustrations, 14s.

"Among the few travellers who have taken the opportunity recently afforded of exploring the little-known region of the Eastern Caucasus, an honourable place must now be accorded to the Hon. John Abercromby, who in this volume has given a very interesting and informative account of the country between Tiflis and Derbend—its scenery, its people, the archaeological remains, and the language. He travelled with his own eyes, and his notes on the physical aspects of Daghestan are full of information. Altogether his book is a good specimen of the useful as distinguished from the picturesque or sensational literature of travel. Three maps and numerous woodcuts add to the practical utility of the work."—Scottish Leader.

SEAS and SKIES in MANY LATI-TUDES; or, Wanderings in Search of Weather. By the Hon. RALPH ABERCROMBY. Demy 8vo, with 8 Maps, 9 Photographs, and 33 Woodcuts by Pritchett, Whymper, Cooper, &c., cloth extra, 18s.

"This is not an ordinary book of travels. It has been written mainly for the purposes of calling attention to such phenomena of the sky and weather as Mr. Abercromby has observed in the various parts of the world. He gives an account of a voyage round the world, beginning with what he saw in Egypt, and passing on to descriptions relating to Australia, New Caledonia, Fiji, New Zealand, Cape Horn, and Rio Janeiro. He by no means confines this narrative to matters specially attractive to meteorologists. He takes interest in many different classes of subjects, and has something more or less memorable to record about almost all the places he has visited. It is, however, meteorology that he keeps chiefly in view, and we need scarcely say that on this subject, which he has so long and carefully studied, his book is always fresh and instructive."—Nature.

THE NEW FAR WEST and the OLD FAR EAST. Being an Account of Recent Travel and Observation along the Line of the Canadian Pacific and Manitoba and North-Western Railway, thence to Japan, China, Ceylon, &c. By W.
HENRY BARNEBY, Author of "Life and Labour in the Far Far West." Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. With 8 Maps and 8 Page Illustrations.

"Mr. Barneby is a traveller who makes the tour of the world in a business manner and in a business frame of mind. Is the first sentence of his 'New Far West and Old Far East' he steps 'on board' the main line of the Canadian Pacific, and he keeps busily noting useful agricultural and commercial facts, with only a moderate attention to the literary graces, until he reaches Peking. His Canadian chapters are the freshest and fullest of practical interest, and he is able to speak, from observation and inquiry, respecting the capabilities, not only of the country between Winnipeg and Vancouver City, but of the 'park-like lands of the fertile belt' traversed by the Manitoba and North-Western Railway."—Scottsman.

RUDYARD KIPLINGS' TALES.

Additional Copies have now been received of PLAIN TALES from the HILLS. By RUDYARD KIPLING. Second Edition. 6s.
"Rattling stories of dirt and sport... Funny stories of practical jokes and galls... and little stories of deeper things told with an affectation of solemnity, but rather more throat-lumping for that."—Sunday Times.
"There is a sustained power of description, knowledge of men and women, and terse epigrammatic wit, which would suffice to build up half a hundred works of fiction."—Broad Arrow.
"Mr. Kipling knows and appreciates the English in India, and is a born story-teller and a man of humour into the bargain.... It would be hard to find better reading."—Saturday Review.

Ready March 7th. 5s., post-free.
DEPARTMENTAL DITTIES and other VERSES. Being Humorous Poems of Indian Official Life. By RUDYARD KIPLING. Fourth Edition, with Ten Additional Poems. In square 32mo, 5s.
"They reflect with light gaiety the thoughts and feelings of actual men and women, and are true as well as clever.... Mr. Kipling achieves the feat of making Anglo-Indian society airt and intrigues visibly before our eyes.... His book gives hope of a new literary star of an exile we know in modern poetry."—Field.
"They will suffer little by comparison with the best work of Præd or Locker. 'Departmental Ditties' proper are followed by an anthology of 'other verses,' possessing a variety and a charm which it would be difficult to praise too highly."—Englishman.

Just published, Fourth Edition, 8s. 6d.
The TRIBES on MY FRONTIER: an Indian Naturalist's Foreign Policy. By EHA. With 50 Illustrations by F. C. Macrae. In Imperial 16mo.
"It is a very clever record of a year's observations round the bungallow in 'Dustypore'.... It is by no means a mere travesty.... The writer is always amusing, and never dull."—Field.
"The book is cleverly illustrated by Mr. F. C. Macrae. We have only to thank our Anglo-Indian naturalist for the delightful book which he has sent home to his countrymen in Britain. May he live to give us another such!"—Chambers's Journal.
"The volume is full of accurate and unfamiliar observation, and the illustrations prove to be by no means without their value."—Saturday Review.

Just published, Third Edition, 6s.
BEHIND the BUNGALOW. By Eha.
With 58 clever Sketches by the Illustrator of "The Tribes."
As "The Tribes on My Frontier" graphically and humor-ously described the Animal Surroundings of an Indian Bungalow, the present work describes with much pleasantry the Human Officials thereof, with their peculiarities, idiosyncrasies, and, to the European, strange methods of duty.
"The Tribes on My Frontier" was very good; "Behind the Bungallow" is even better. Anglo-Indians will see how truthful are these sketches. People who know nothing about India will delight in the clever drawings and the truly humorous descriptions; and, their appetite for fun being gratified, they will not fail to note the under-current of sympathy."—Graphic.

Just published, crown 8vo, 9s.

COMPLETION OF VOLUME I. (A—CONO).
THE CENTURY DICTIONARY:
An ENCYCLOPÆDIO LEXICON of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE.
Edited by Professor W. D. WHITNEY, Ph.D., LL.D. (Yale University).
PROFUSELY AND ARTISTICALLY ILLUSTRATED.
Cloth gilt, sprinkled edges, price £2 2s. Half-morocco, cloth sides, marbled edges, £2 16s. Also in Twenty-four Monthly Parts, price 10s. 6d. each.

From "THE ATHENÆUM," of MARCH 1, 1890.
"The 'Century Dictionary' bids fair to be far and away the largest and best general and encyclopedic dictionary of the English language.... Though cheapness has not been aimed at, the intrinsic merits of the work make it one of the cheapest publications ever issued.... It is calculated that the 'Century' when complete, in the latter part of next year, will comprise about 30,000 more articles than the complete work which now claims pre-eminence in this respect. The first volume, which is now under review, has been evidently edited with all the care and skill to be expected from the supervision of one of the most distinguished philologists in the world.... The work, notwithstanding incalculable variety and difficulty, is singularly free from error of any kind. The typography is thoroughly satisfactory, and the general appearance of the volume is handsome and attractive.
The selection of the subjects for the pictorial illustrations cannot be too highly praised. Many of the choicest works of art to be found in Europe have been reproduced in a style worthy of their excellence, and their introduction to the public through the medium of a popular dictionary ought to have an appreciable effect in elevating national taste both in England and America. The cuts appended to the zoological articles are first rate, and the birds, monkeys, and snakes, prove as attractive to the child as to the savant; while the numerous entomological illustrations portraying insects in various stages, ought to be of practical use to farmers and gardeners. To judge from the volume before us, this great work will be characterised throughout, and in every respect, by a lavish expenditure of labour and capital, of rare ability and technical skill, all turned to the best advantage by careful and capable attention to the uniform realisation of a thoroughly judicious plan.

THE ADVENTURE SERIES.

Large crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s. each.
Under this title Mr. T. Fisher Unwin will publish a Collection of the Lives of Men and Women remarkable for adventurous careers. Thus to the English fireside will be introduced Adventurers of all Countries —Travellers, Seamen, and Soldiers, Buccaneers of Note, and Famous Robbers, Prisoners who have escaped from Captivity, and those who, banded together, have passed through danger and difficulty. That the reader may be better acquainted with his new acquaintances, the Publisher will give preference, where possible, to autobiographies over compilations. The Volumes will average 400 pp., and will be fully illustrated.

The First Volume will appear Next Week, and will be entitled
THE ADVENTURES OF A YOUNGER SON.

By E. J. TRELAWNY. With an Introduction by EDWARD GARNETT.
ILLUSTRATED WITH SEVERAL PORTRAITS OF TRELAWNY, AND AN AUTOGRAPH LETTER.
(IN PREPARATION.)

ITALIAN CHARACTERS in the EPOCH of UNIFICATION.

By the Countess E. MARTINENGO CESARESCO.
This Work contains the Lives of BETTINO RICASOLI, CONSTANCE D'AZEGLIO, UGO BASSI, DANIEL MANIN, THE CAIROLIS, LUIGI SETTEMBRINI, THE POERROS, and many others.
"The strongly-marked variations in the characters of these men and women, contrasting as it does with their singular unity of purpose and action, imparts a stronger and more sustained interest to the book than usually attaches to a collection of essays. The papers are written with insight into the sources of recent Italian history, and will be read with pleasure and profit by all who are interested in that subject."—Scotsman.

FOURTH EDITION NOW READY.

With Portrait and Map, 2 vols., crown 8vo, 24s.

OUR VICEREGAL LIFE in INDIA:

Being a Selection from my Journal during the years 1884-8.

By the MARCHIONESS of DUFFERIN.

"Just what might have been expected from the talented and popular 'Viceress.' As a record it is remarkably complete. There was no province of our teeming Indian Empire which was left uncovered by the Viceressal tours: and an observant eye and lively pen made the best of Lady Dufferin's opportunity."—Full Mail Gazette.

"A record of life in India as it presented itself during a sojourn of four years in all its rich and manifold variety, to the wife of a Viceroy, could only fail to be deeply interesting through some deficiency of sympathy or lack of descriptive power. Happily, in neither of these prime requirements for her task is Lady Dufferin in any way wanting."—Daily News.

ON THE CHILDREN. 3 vols.

By ANNIE THOMAS (Mrs. FENDER CUDLIP), Author of "Allerton Towers" (2s. 6d.), &c.

"Indefatigable Miss Annie Thomas has produced one more readable and interesting story in her latest novel.... Her characters are brightly and clearly drawn in every case, her dialogue natural, and her incidents sufficiently interesting to keep the attention of readers continually alert. We shall be surprised if 'On the Children' does not prove to the full as popular as any of the author's previous stories."—Court Journal

"Mrs. Fender Cudlip keeps the ball of complication rolling with dexterity, and her lively manner prevents the reader from examining too nearly the consistency of her plot."—Morning Post

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

Now Published for the First Time.

THE EARLY DIARY of FRANCES

BURNEY, 1768-1778. With a Selection from her Correspondence and from the Journals of her Sisters, Susan and Charlotte Burney. Edited by ANNIE RAINE ELLIS. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 88s.

"These diaries are full of piquant anecdotes, and have been admirably edited by Mrs. Ellis."—Academy

"We have not for a long time come across such a land of pure delight in the book sense as the volumes which Mrs. Ellis has here been enabled to put before the public."—Saturday Review

"Mrs. Ellis, who has produced the best recent editions of 'Evelina' and 'Cecilia,' has expended no small amount of labour on the production of Fanny Burney's 'Early Diary,' which is now printed for the first time. That it should have been so long retained in manuscript is surprising, for it almost vies in interest with the well-known diary that begins with the date at which these earlier pages end. It is a work deserving all the care Mrs. Ellis has bestowed on it."—Athenaeum

THE NEW SPIRIT. By Havelock

MODERN FRENCH READINGS.

With Helps for Composition. Edited by A. JAM-SON SMITH, M.A., Headmaster of King Edward's School, Camp Hill, Birmingham. Crown 8vo, 283 pp., cloth, 3s.

"The extracts are taken from the works of Dumas, Berquin, Gautier, Gide, Victor Hugo, and the Comtesse de Ségur; they are well graduated, and sufficiently long to avoid scapiness. The notes are short and pertinent; useful hints for composition are provided, and these are illustrated by references to the text, and supplemented by well-chosen sentences for translation into French."—The Guardian.

WILLIAMS and LASCELLES' IN-

RODUCTION to CHEMICAL SCIENCE. Edited by B. P. LASCELLES, M.A., F.O.S., Assistant-Master and Librarian at Harrow School. Crown 8vo, 232 pages, cloth, 8s. 6d., with 50 illustrations.

D. MURRAY, Esq., the Academy, Kilmarnock, says:—"The book appears to me to be the best summary published of the elementary facts of Chemistry. Especially worthy of praise are the Chapters which state so shortly, and yet so clearly, the various Laws of Chemistry."

PRACTICAL LATIN COMPOSITION.

By W. O. COLLAR, Author of "The Beginner's Latin Book," Cloth, crown 8vo, 278 pages, 5s.

From the Athenæum, Feb. 8, 1890:—"We should like to see the use of this royal road to the mastery of Latin in all fourth and fifth forms made compulsory. Our readers ought to judge for themselves of a work which, unassuming as its subject is, has surprised us into an enthusiasm which does not abate on reflection."

LITERATURE.

Problems of Greater Britain. By Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke. In 2 vols. (Macmillan.)

THE demand for Sir Charles Dilke's Greater Britain continues, although the work itself is out of date. This he modestly attributes to the title. In 1875 the author made his second journey round the globe, and added two chapters and foot-notes to Greater Britain, to bring the volumes, if possible, up to date; but, he tells us, the attempt was a failure, as the whole scheme of the work would have had to be recast in order to prevent it, in many passages, from conveying inaccurate impressions. Since then he has undertaken two more journeys, in each of which he made his way half round the world; but he has not attempted to write them in the form of travel. He wisely concluded that there was room for an entirely new book upon the same subjects as were treated of in the original work, but dealt with from the point of view of political and social observation and comparison rather than from that of descriptive sight-seeing. Hence the two volumes now before us—bulky, indeed, but not a page too long. They are a perfect mine of information, and contain social and political treatises and discussions of the highest value. The difficulty with a book like the present one is to know how to select portions for notice, when all are of deep interest and importance.

The whole of the first volume, and about one-third of the second, contain comprehensive accounts of the colonies and possessions of Great Britain, their origin, constitutions, trade, taxation, and institutions generally, their relations to one another, and especially their attitude towards the mother country. Sir Charles begins with Newfoundland, the nearest to Great Britain of those of her colonies which possess responsible governments, and the colony which claims to be the oldest English settlement in connexion with the crown. The next in order of our colonies is the Dominion of Canada. Canada, we learn, is less separatist in feeling than young Australia, in spite, says Sir Charles, of the neighbourhood of a rival and attractive English-speaking power. But may not this neighbourhood be rather a cause of the loyalty of the Canadians? It is one thing to become an independent nation, and another to be absorbed by a powerful neighbour. In the province of Quebec the Church of Rome has a stronger position than in any Roman Catholic country in Europe—stronger even than in Belgium, or in Ireland itself. She has the power of a State Church, and, indeed, greater powers than those enjoyed by the Church of England. The Church has the power to assess and raise rates for the support of ecclesiastical fabrics, and her property is exempt from municipal taxation. Sentences of excommunication are published by some of the Lower Canadian journals, with the names of the offenders, almost in the way in which bankruptcies are gazetted in communities less ecclesiastical. The prime minister of Quebec lately appeared at a public festival in the gorgeous raiment of a papal order, and the bishops and priests exercise a somewhat minute supervision over the lives of their people. The tone of politics is higher in Canada than in the United States, and there is less abstention from politics among some of the best men than is the case across the border. The leading men are throughout the Dominion willing or anxious to undertake parliamentary duties. The fact that members are paid does not call forth the imputation that they seek seats for the sake of the stipend, and scandals of corruption are all but unheard of. In the opinion of Sir Charles Dilke, Canada has the certainty of a prosperous future before her. He considers that, of all lands under a temperate climate to which British emigrants can go, North America is by far the most accessible; and, until that continent is completely filled, it is unlikely that they will go elsewhere in great numbers. The Argentine Republic is farther off, and is a land of Spanish and Italian speech; South Africa is too largely peopled by Dutch and natives; while Australia is still more distant. It will be noticed that this applies as much to the United States as to the Dominion of Canada; and it may be doubted which has most inducements to offer to the intending emigrant. Canada possesses one great disadvantage in the enormous length of the frontier between it and the United States, one half of which is purely artificial. Of wholly unprovoked invasion, the Dominion, Sir Charles thinks, runs no risk; but war between the United Kingdom and the United States, though happily improbable, is a possible contingency for which he pronounces the Canadians to be totally unprepared. Apart from Canada, we would quote the following interesting observation:

"The Spaniards of Mexico and of Central and South America have given way to an active and intelligent mixed race of Spanish, Indian, and Negro blood; and it is a remarkable fact that while the English in North America, who, on the whole, adopted a humane treatment of the natives, have, in fact, destroyed them, the Spanish, who robbed and massacred through two-thirds of the New World, have themselves very largely been absorbed by the Indian race."

The chapter on "The Protection of Native Industries" is second to none in interest, and the author discusses the subject with his usual ability and remarkable candour. He does not treat the Protectionists as idiots, nor talk of Free Trade as if it was a dogma in religion or an axiom in mathematics. He is willing to admit that there is much to be said on either side; that under a certain set of circumstances one cause may be expedient, and under a different set the other.

"The fact is," he writes, "that it is not easy for a Free Trader to give a perfectly fair statement of the facts bearing upon colonial Protection without being himself thought to be an apostate; for it is necessary in the first place, and above all, to point out that many of the statements made by British and by New South Wales Free Traders with regard to the consequences of colonial Protection will not stand the test of examination. In Greater Britain I pointed out that colonial Protection was not only strong but growing, and that it had in Victoria and Canada the support of many extremely able and intelligent men who were perfectly convinced Protectionists, while throughout the colonies there was a rapidly increasing minority in its favour. Since that time the whole of the great self-governing colonies, except New South Wales and the Cape, have become Protectionist, while the Cape has heavy duties upon most goods, put on, however, mainly for revenue purposes, but now beginning to give rise to a growth of protectionist opinion; and in New South Wales the Free Traders hold their own only by a bare majority. The comparisons which have been drawn between Victoria and New South Wales by the Free Traders and the Protectionists during the last sixteen years, when impartially considered, prove that neither Protection nor Free Trade has much affected the neck-and-neck race which the colonies have hitherto been running."

It is important in this discussion to keep distinct the three separate purposes for which high duties have been charged: (1) For revenue purposes as at the Cape, and in New Zealand, if, as we understand, the enormous duties lately imposed are levied on all goods of every description imported into the colony, whether of a kind manufactured in the colony or not; (2) for bona fide protection; (3) for political reasons, as some of the direct taxes on real estate and on successions in Australia, and the progressive income-tax in the Pays de Vaud, alluded to by Sir Charles Dilke. We cannot agree with him that Vaud is one of the most enlightened cantons. We believe it to be much the reverse, and that this may be attributed to the small proportion the town population bears to the purely rural. One effect of the imposition of the graduated income-tax in Vaud has been to drive many comparatively wealthy men out of the canton, and even some manufacturers have moved their staff and plant. It appears that in Australia one of the principal objects of the Protectionists is to keep up wages—an explanation of Protection being in favour with democracies. Our author finishes this chapter by refuting, from the example of Victoria, the statement of Sir Lyon Playfair that "Protection leads slowly, but surely, to Socialism, and tends even to Communism."

"Now colonial example," says Sir Charles, "so far from giving support to this contention, goes to show that Protection in Canada and in Victoria, where it has long been tried, has a decidedly conservative effect; and no country in the whole world has less leaning towards revolutionary Socialism or towards Communism than has our Protectionist colony of Victoria."

He blames Sir Lyon Playfair for ignoring, like too many writers, the evidence afforded by the history of our colonies; and in another place he says—

"So complete is our ignorance with regard to colonial experiments that it is equalled only by the want of knowledge in the colonies about one another. As regards the federated colonies of Australasia, the institution of the Federal Council has done something to familiarise a few statesmen with the legislation of other colonies; but generally speaking, Australian politicians know little of what has been done outside of their own state, and nothing about Canada or South Africa, while Canadian statesmen are in a condition of blank ignorance about Australia."

Sir Charles has a chapter, headed "Future Relations between the Mother-Country and the Remainder of the Empire," which is not entirely satisfactory. All the various schemes for federation or for closer union are discussed, and none of them is pronounced thoroughly practicable. In his opinion, the crux of imperial federation lies in the tariff question.

"It seems," he writes, "of little use to discuss the details of schemes for the future government of the empire involving a closer connexion between the mother-country and the colonies than that which exists at present, unless colonial feeling generally would tolerate an attempt to draw more taut the ties that bind the component parts of the empire to one another."

And he adds that in the last two years there has been a marked change in the direction of opposition to the idea of imperial federation, and the majority of Australian colonists are disinclined to trouble their heads upon the question. Australia, too, we are told, is gliding by insensible degrees into a national life; and, while an alliance between herself and the mother country on present conditions may long continue, it would be highly dangerous to attempt to replace it by a tighter bond. Nor can it be said that the idea of imperial unity, which, so far as regards Canada, dates from the time of Adam Smith, has made rapid progress of a practical kind; nevertheless there is a certain drawing together of the ties that now connect the mother country with the colonies from the increased facilities of communication.

The defence of the vast empire of Great Britain is a subject which Sir Charles Dilke has made his own, and on which he can speak with more authority than probably any other civilian. For some time he has been doing his utmost to awaken the public to a sense of our want of preparation in the event of war breaking out, and now he writes:

"The danger in our path is that the enormous forces of European militarism may crush the old country and destroy the integrity of our empire before the growth of the newer communities that it contains has made it too strong for the attack. It is conceivable that within the next few years Great Britain might be drawn into war, and receive in that war, at the hands of a coalition, a blow from which she would not recover, and one of the consequences of which would be the loss of Canada and of India, and the proclamation of Australian independence. Enormous as are our military resources for a prolonged conflict, they are inadequate to meet the unprecedented necessities of a sudden war."

He devotes a considerable space of the portion of this book which treats of India to its defence against a possible invasion by Russia, and our relations in that connexion with Afghanistan. All this will probably be beyond the ordinary reader; but it is of vast importance to keep the subject before the public. It is melancholy to read that 'it is hardly possible for those who have given careful attention to this subject to realise how little it is understood by many of those in England who are supposed to be authorities upon the question, and who, to the great danger of the empire, are allowed to throw difficulties in the Indian Viceroy's way."

He insists on the absolute necessity of our being sufficiently prepared to win the first big battle; for if we should lose it, the native states will turn against us.

In his able chapter on "Imperial Defence" Sir Charles pronounces against our relying entirely on our navy in case of war. He points out the impossibility of an effective blockade of the enemy's ports, or of stationing men-of-war at every vulnerable point, and the absolute necessity of sufficient picked troops being ready to cope with an invasion. The possession of innumerable safe posts in all parts of the world forms one of the chief elements of our maritime power, and the necessity for sufficient and properly defended coaling stations is pre-eminent. One of the first objects of our navy in war must be the destruction of the enemy's coaling stations.

On the subject of the danger of our being starved by losing the command of the sea, Sir Charles is both original and convincing. He writes:

"It is not at all certain that if we lost for a time the command of the sea it would be so easy to starve us here at home that no nation would be at the trouble to organise an invasion. The word investment has been freely used to describe the condition of partial blockade in which we should have to live if our command of the seas was gone. Investment is a military term applied to the early stage of a siege, and means the process of occupying all the approaches to a fortified place so thoroughly as to exclude the possibility of the reception of supplies; but for investment to be fatal it must be complete. The proportion between the mouths to be fed inside and the land defended must be such that sufficient food cannot possibly be produced for the supply of the garrison and the civil population after accumulations have been exhausted; and in order to produce complete investment the besiegers must have a force proportioned to the extent of the circumference which is to be invested; while the military strength of the country within which the investment takes place must have been so broken down that there is no power to raise the siege. The whole of these conditions are not likely to be fulfilled in the case supposed—a struggle of the British Empire single-handed against two naval powers. No doubt we should suffer some reverses at sea in the future as always in the past; but it is difficult to believe that the United Kingdom could possibly be invested in the early stages of a war. The first effect of a naval struggle would be to raise the price of all commodities dependent on sea transport. Our sailing vessels would be laid up, and the least fast among our merchant steamers transferred to other flags. One result would be a considerably increased production of food at home. There would also be an immense sudden importation in view of rising prices. In the eleven days between September 4 and September 15, 1870, Paris was supplied with five months' food; and although the conditions are not the same, still, even in the case of England, the country would to a large extent victual itself in advance by the ordinary operations of trade. Much waste of food would cease through enforced economy, and every inch of soil would be occupied in the production of grain or meat. While great accumulations of food would have taken place at the very commencement of the war, the quantity of food bought and consumed would somewhat diminish, and the United Kingdom would come much nearer to providing for its own necessary supplies than it has done for many a year. If ever complete investment took place, there would, of course, be hardship; but it is not certain that that hardship would be unbearable, or that we should be starved out of existence. . . . Moreover, even after investment had been attempted, I doubt whether the United Kingdom could be debarred from receiving any supplies by sea."

If we were asked which was the ablest part of this very able book, we should say the chapter on "Indian Defence."

WM. WICKHAM.

Life of Harriet Beecher Stowe. Compiled from her Letters and Journals, by her Son, Charles Edward Stowe. (Sampson Low.)

SEEMING that the public life of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe covers a period of something like forty years, during which time she has been a prominent figure both in literature and in social movement, the biography now published is sure of numerous interested readers in the old world as well as in the new. It is a simple story enough—the record, not perhaps of a great, but at least of a useful and honourable career.

Mr. James Russell Lowell considered Mrs. Stowe a woman of genius; at any rate she was the possessor of high talent, even if a certain lack of clearness of mental perception, which caused her judgment to be sometimes faulty, makes us hesitate to apply to her the word genius. She was an emotional rather than an inspired woman. If we compare her with country-women of her own, we find she had neither the large mental grasp of Margaret Fuller nor the spiritual height and breadth of Louisa Alcott. Yet, within her narrower sphere, she was admirable—an earnest, brave, and pious woman. If she erred in judgment, assuredly she was never false to the highest truth she knew. We read that, when she was ten years of age, she wrote a school composition on the subject, "Can the Immortality of the Soul be proved by the Light of Nature?"; and at thirteen she was "powerfully affected" by reading Baxter's Saint's Rest, and "much interested" in Butler's Analogy. These, it must be confessed, were not favourable symptoms; but, happily, the seemingly morbid tendency did not survive in her, unless, indeed, some leanings toward the cruder forms of spiritualism, and other occasional exhibitions of over-credulity, are to be regarded as its later development. She was naturally unobtrusive, what is termed a "domesticated" woman—one who loved her family and her home so well that, had she been destined to remain always in the background, she would have been well content. No doubt, fame did please her, while public censure touched her deeply. But she seems to have had no constitutional craving for notoriety of any kind; and, from beginning to end, her own home and family held the chief place in her regard.

Circumstances brought her into prominence. She belonged to a family of clergymen. Her father was the famous Lyman Beecher; six of her brothers were ministers, and her husband was a minister. Unlike most of the American clergy of that day, they were actively interested in the emancipation of the negroes; and so it came to pass that Mrs. Stowe, both before her marriage and after, lived largely in an atmosphere of Abolition. She came in contact with slaves; she heard much of their sorrows, and witnessed the efforts of her own family in their behalf, until at length she was moved to use her own special talent in the same cause. — Uncle Tom's Cabin was the result—a work which, as her biographer says, “was an outburst of deep feeling, a cry in the darkness.” Its effect was instant and great. Public feeling was aroused in a way which nothing else could have aroused it. That outbursts of this emotional kind are perilous need not be questioned. Oftener than not they do more harm than good. But occasionally they are so timely and necessary that they effect some great end. Uncle Tom's Cabin, says Mr. Stowe, made the Fugitive Slave Law inoperative. At any rate, it did much to arouse the dormant moral sense of America, and proved a factor, which it is not easy to over-estimate, in the Abolition movement. Other works followed from Mrs. Stowe's pen, only less powerful than Uncle Tom's Cabin for the special end she had in view, and superior to it as contributions to literature. In her time, she was the victim of extravagant praise and of equally extravagant censure; and it speaks well for the steadfastness of her character that neither one nor the other spoiled her in the least. From first to last there is the same cheerful outlook upon life, the same fidelity to duty, and the same simplicity.

In a letter written by Nathaniel Hawthorne to Mrs. Stowe in 1863, John Bull is described as “a hardened and villainous hypocrite,” caring “nothing for or against slavery, except as it gave him a vantage-ground on which to parade his own virtue and sneer at our iniquity.” Nevertheless, Mrs. Stowe's own experiences in this country were pleasant enough. She was welcomed enthusiastically on her first visit, which took place when Uncle Tom's Cabin was at the height of its popularity, and cordially on subsequent occasions. She found many warm sympathisers with the cause with which she had identified herself, and made many friends. Among these were the Duchess of Sutherland, the Duke and Duchess of Argyll—for in those pre-crofter days the Duke of Argyll was a prominent denouncer of oppression—Lady Byron, Mrs. Browning, George Eliot, and Mrs. Gaskell. It was, of course, the intimacy with Lady Byron which led to the one great blunder of Mrs. Stowe's literary career. That Mrs. Stowe not only believed the story which she told, but also exercised great courage in undertaking to make it known, need not be doubted. Her error was not of intention, but of judgment. Deficient in critical powers, she was not constituted to balance evidence properly. Her action in the Byron matter, like her action with respect to slavery, was an outburst of the emotional kind; but, unlike the other, it was untimely and mischievous. Mr. Stowe treats of this subject in his biography with tact and delicacy.

An eminently characteristic letter from Mr. James Russell Lowell to Mrs. Stowe is printed in this volume. The occasion which called it forth was the publication of The Minister's Wooing in the pages of the Atlantic Monthly, of which famous magazine Mr. Lowell was then the editor. In his opinion, The Minister's Wooing was one of the best of Mrs. Stowe's works. What he valued in Uncle Tom, he says, was “the genius and not the moral”; and he proceeds to discuss at some length the much-debated question of moral purpose in fiction:

“A moral aim is a fine thing; but, in making a story, an artist is a traitor who does not sacrifice everything to art. Remember the lesson that Christ gave us twice over. First, he preferred the useless Mary to the dish-washing Martha; and next, when that exemplary moralist and friend of humanity, Judas, objected to the sinful waste of the Magdalen's ointment, the great Teacher would rather it should be wasted in an act of simple beauty than utilised for the benefit of the poor. Cleopatra was an artist when she dissolved her biggest pearl to captivate her Antony-public. May I, a critic by profession, say the whole truth to a woman of genius? Yes? And never be forgiven? I shall try, and try to be forgiven, too. In the first place, pay no regard to the advice of anybody. In the second place, pay a great deal to mine! A Kilkenney-cattish sort of advice? Not at all. My advice is to follow your own instincts, to stick to nature, and to avoid what people commonly call the ‘Ideal’; for that, and beauty and pathos and success, all lie in the simply natural. . . . There are ten thousand people who can write ‘ideal’ things for one who can see and feel and reproduce nature and character. Ten thousand, did I say? Nay, ten million. What made Shakespeare so great? Nothing but eyes and—faith in them. The same is true of Thackeray. I see nowhere more often than in authors the truth that men love their opposites. Dickens insists on being tragic, and makes shipwreck” (pp. 333-34).

Wise and suggestive words truly, even if marred, as much of Mr. Lowell's criticism is marred, by over-statement. He sacrifices too much to fine telling phrases. That concluding sentence about Dickens, for example, contains an element of truth as part of a comparison between Dickens, on the one hand, and Shakespeare and Thackeray on the other; but to say he “makes shipwreck” is a vivid statement in excess of the truth. This same letter abounds in “potted wisdom,” such as—

“Let your moral take care of itself, and remember that an author's writing-desk is something infinitely higher than a pulpit” (p. 335). . . . “As for ‘orthodoxy,’ be at ease. Whatever is well done, the world finds orthodox at last” (p. 335).

Other letters, hardly less interesting than the foregoing, may also be found here—from Mr. Ruskin, from George Eliot, and from Dr. Holmes.

Several admirable portraits adorn the volume, not the least interesting of which is that of Prof. Stowe. What we see in this portrait, and what we are told in the accompanying pages of this scholarly man, make us wish to know more. If there is a fault to be charged against the biographer, it is that he has been too reticent about everyone excepting the subject of his book. His father, at least, might with advantage have been more fully displayed.

To read the private history of a simple-hearted and faithful woman such as Mrs. Stowe is naturally agreeable and profitable; and the lucid, temperate, and unobtrusive manner in which the Rev. Charles Edward Stowe has set it before us enhances the benefit greatly. He has avoided the pitfalls which beset biographers, with signal success. Over-minuteness, over-statement, cowardly or dishonest suppression of unpleasant truths—none of these is to be found. Instead, we have a plain narrative of facts, well arranged, and well set forth, with a good critical perception of fitness and proportion, all which merits are the more noteworthy in the case of a son writing the biography of his mother—an undertaking, one would think, peculiarly difficult.

WALTER LEWIN.

Lux Mundi. Edited by Charles Gore. (John Murray.)

THE origin of this “series of studies in the religion of the Incarnation” is the first thing to be noted about them. The eleven contributors, most of them by this time leaders of High Church opinion in the Anglican Church, “found themselves at Oxford together between the years 1875-85, engaged in the common work of university education, and compelled for their own sake, no less than that of others, to attempt to put the Catholic faith into its right relation to modern intellectual and moral problems.”

Lux Mundi, therefore, the result of their attempt, is an “effort on behalf of the Christian creed in the way of explanation” by men of proved ability and learning, whose peculiar position as Oxford tutors has compelled them to study the problems of modern philosophy and modern science more candidly and thoroughly than is possible to the clergyman engaged in parochial work; and this will gain for them a respectful hearing from many who are accustomed to ignore Christian apologetics altogether. The essayists, moreover, taken as a body, can claim to speak for the most active, if not the most powerful, section of the English Church. Their volume may almost be called a manifesto of the High Church party.

These facts prepare us for a remarkable volume, and we are not disappointed. No sort of literature is more eagerly shunned by the casual reader than the second-rate religious essay; but in compensation, when work of real originality and conviction is produced, he is even more interested and moved than the professional theologian. Lux Mundi will be widely read. The learning, the literary gifts, the philosophical grasp of the authors, are undeniable; and their earnest sincerity, their missionary spirit, gives their writing a strength and directness unattainable by the mere scholar. Their method, also, is popular; it is not too rigorous and scientific; the new views put forward are not insisted upon so fiercely as to disconcert and turn back timid readers.

To attempt a detailed criticism of the twelve essays in this volume is impossible; we must be content to point out their meaning as a manifesto of High Church views. It is the position taken up by the writers on inspiration that is new and important. They re-state and re-model the current orthodoxy, in deference to two movements of modern thought which hitherto their party in the English Church has not, as a party, admitted to be reconcilable with orthodoxy. Canon Moore, Mr. Talbot, Mr. Illing-worth, and Mr. Gore, accept the theory of evolution in more or less general terms. They do not deal with the theory in its relation to physical science, except indirectly; but they accept and welcome it as spiritually and historically applicable to religion. The philosopher has often smiled at the implicit evolution latent in many of the writings of even orthodox divines, and noted with satisfaction the insensible advance of the spirit of the age; but in Lux Mundi he will find the theory explicit. The authors entertain the angel awares, and rejoice in the angelic nature of the visitant. Secondly, the essayists, without committing themselves to any results, recognise the importance and necessity of the scientific criticism of the Old Testament; they cordially, and opportunely, bless the work of Canon Cheyne and Canon Driver, and even quote with approval from Prof. Robertson Smith; they contend that:

"The Church cannot insist upon the historical character of the earliest records of the ancient Church in detail, as she can on the historical character of the Gospels or the Acts of the Apostles."

The question has to be asked as to the earlier part of Jewish history:

"Does it pass back out of history into myth? In particular, are not its earlier narratives, before the call of Abraham, of the nature of myth, in which we cannot distinguish the historical germ, though we do not at all deny that it exists?"

The theory of evolution is applied by the essayists historically and philosophically. Mr. Illingworth's essay on "the Incarnation and Development" is a bold and striking enforcement of the view that "no sooner was the incarnation accomplished than it flooded the whole part of Greece no less than Judaea with a new light." Both Mr. Talbot and Mr. Gore shrink somewhat from this position, and even clash with it occasionally. The essayists have not striven after strict and logical agreement with each other, nor apparently made any effort to detect inconsistencies, and suppress contrary and wayward currents of thought, which increase the charm and suggestiveness of the individual essays, but undoubtedly obscure the meaning of the book as a whole. The hostile critic, when Mr. Illingworth speaks of the Greeks as inspired and talks of the discoveries of science as revelations, will easily confute him out of Mr. Talbot's "Preparation in History for Christ"; and Mr. Gore and Canon Moore cannot always be reconciled; but on the whole the common desire and tendency of these four writers is to insist that "the pre-Christian religions were the age-long prayer. The incarnation was the answer."

Canon Moore applies evolution to the philosophy of religion in a paper on "The Christian Doctrine of God." His essay makes us painfully conscious of the loss sustained by his recent death. It contends that evolution

"restores the truth of the Divine immanence which deism denied. . . . Science had pushed the deist's God farther and farther away; and at the moment when it seemed as if He would be thrust out altogether Darwinism appeared, and, under the disguise of a foe, did the work of a friend. It has conferred upon philosophy and religion an inestimable benefit, by showing us that we must choose between two alternatives."

We have only one remark to make upon Canon Moore's argument. In making the claim that the Christian doctrine of the Trinity answers the two demands of reason for a unity of the reasonable and for the immanence of the reasonable in nature, he occasionally forgets that the Christian doctrine is a mystery; "the unsolved contradiction of non-Christian thought" is recognised and accepted in the Christian doctrine, but not solved. It remains a mystery.

But we must pass on to Mr. Gore's recognition of the importance of modern criticism of the Old Testament. As regards the mythical character of the opening chapters of Genesis, the possibility of "erroneous anticipations" in the prophetic writings, and of editing and idealising in the historical books, he speaks quite clearly. But he does more than this. He is aware of the folly of those apologists whose ignorance of the nature of scientific proof permits them to assert that the Old and New Testament books are equally verifiable, and he perceives that their one reasonable argument for insisting on the equal historical reality of both canons is the plea that Christ pledges Himself to the accuracy of the Old Testament. Mr. Gore answers this plea by arguing that Christ "shows no signs at all of transcending the science of His age," and "shows no signs at all of transcending the history of His age."

It is clear that the authors of Lux Mundi have been moved by a very earnest desire to recommend the truth of their religion to minds at present alienated. Their position at Oxford has made them alive to the fact that, speaking generally, their Church does not draw into the ranks of her ministry the ablest and strongest minds of the nation. The orthodox theory of inspiration is largely responsible for this. The classical education England has preferred in the past to insist upon has continually kept before the minds of the educated the falseness of a theory which denies any inspiration to the literatures and histories of Greece and Rome. The young man who has been led back from scepticism by "a chorus-ending from Euripides" to what Canon Holland so eloquently defines as faith—to some measure of communion with a living god, if only the god of Socrates—may well shrink from declaring even implicitly that this literature which has saved him was after all unnecessary to his salvation.

We have no space to criticise Mr. Otley's exhaustive and learned treatise—it is much more than an essay—on "Christian Ethics," and we have omitted all reference to the distinctively High Church essays—those on the Church and the Sacraments. Mr. Lock's paper we do not admire. A controversial argument is useful only in so far as it recognises its opponent's point of view. Mr. Lock's essay is unsatisfactory, because it continually draws from premises with which we all agree deductions which many of us entirely dissent from. Mr. Lyttleton, in his treatment of the Atonement, leaves out the question of the personality and power of the evil spirit—an omission to be noticed in all the essays. Moreover, we should like him to examine more rigorously McLeod Campbell's finely expressed explanation of Christ's sufferings as "a perfect Amen in humanity to the judgment of God on the sin of man." Is it credible that the Deity should demand any repetition or doubling of the awfulness of sin on His own account? Does not the idea involve the immoral confusion between sin and suffering? Mr. Lyttleton feels very strongly the inadequacy of much popular teaching on the Atonement, but he scarcely succeeds himself in getting above it. His essay is rather a useful survey of the problem than a fresh contribution to its solution.

RONALD BAYNE.

The Marriages of the Bourbons. By Captain the Hon. D. Bingham. In 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

THIS is an interesting book, a very interesting book; nor can it be regarded as anything but a "happy thought" which has led Capt. Bingham to string together the Bourbon marriages into an almost continuous story. And if some of the pearls thus chapleted are strange, and some grotesque; and if their strangeness and grotesqueness become all the more striking from juxtaposition—why, even so, the result has an undeniable fascination.

While describing the book as interesting, it is, however, only right, I think, to warn the "general reader," for whom, after all, such books as this are written, that the first sixty pages are scarcely a fair sample of what comes afterwards. For in those earlier pages the author is merely chronicling, and, as it were, in short-hand. He is rapidly tracing the descent of the Bourbons from St. Louis, and carrying the family record, at high speed, to the sixteenth century. But when once that point is reached—when once he begins to enter into the negotiations that led to the marriage of Anthony of Bourbon with Jeanne d'Albret, when once he is dealing with royal Bourbons who held sway, if only in the little principality of Navarre, then his pace slackens. He takes time to look about him, culls from the wayside here and there such flowers of anecdote—"foul-flesh'd agaries of the holt," one is sometimes tempted to call them—as come in view, and is altogether an erudite, lively, and amusing companion.

And what a curious medley of marriages these Bourbon marriages are, and how oddly assorted some of the royal couples! Policy, not love, brought nearly all these people together; and, alas! even in the few cases where love had a hand in the match, the results were scarcely more satisfactory. Jeanne d'Albret had suffered a good deal of persecution, including a mock marriage to the hated Duke of Cleves, before she was allowed to marry Anthony of Bourbon; but she scarcely found an ideal husband in that vacillating, weak, pleasure-loving prince. Neither did the Grande Mademoiselle's constancy obtain adequate reward when, after long years of weary waiting, Louis XIV. graciously permitted her to give her hand, and what he had not filched of her fortune, to Lauzun, for Lauzun treated her shamefully. "Vanity of vanities," one is tempted to cry with the Preacher when reading these records of the great ones of the earth. Their power, their pleasures, and their loves—how much of these were vanity! But of all vanities their policy was, perhaps, the lightest.

So little seems to come of it! And, even when something does come of it, that something is so different from what had been purposed and anticipated. The young Prince of Béarn, afterwards Henry IV., is married to Marguerite de Valois; and these ill-starred nuptials, far from depriving the Huguenots of their natural chief, send him back to their camp with store of St. Bartholomew memories, and the knowledge that he has a wife whom no man can honour. Later, being king, he marries Marie de Médicis; and the breath is scarce out of his body when she sets herself to reverse his cherished policy, courts the Spanish alliance, and ultimately arranges that her son, Louis XIII., shall marry the Infanta, known in French history as Anne of Austria. Strange nuptials these between the cold-blooded lad and his child-wife—nuptials only paralleled for strangeness by those in much later years between the Dauphin, afterwards Louis XVI., and Marie Antoinette. And here again—I am speaking of Louis XIII.'s marriage—there are political previsions falsified, and hopes unrealised. But so it is all through; and so it is especially when Spanish marriages are in question, whether in the days of Louis XIV., or in days that are almost our own. Everything in these matrimonial alliances is sacrificed to policy, and the results, so far as policy is concerned, are mainly null or adverse.

All such matters Capt. Bingham sets forth duly; for this book, it must be understood, covers wider ground than the title would strictly imply, and embraces, not only the marriages of the Bourbons, but what brought about the marriages, and what came of them—nay, goes beyond, and includes, with equal fulness of detail, the marriages “of the left hand,” which were so many and important in the reigns of Henry IV., Louis XIV., and Louis XV. Indeed, if one has to hint a fault, it is that, with a subject tending naturally to discursiveness and repetition, the author occasionally goes out of his way to treat of matters—as, for instance, the career of the epicene Chevalier d'Éon—with which he is really but very indirectly concerned. Such digressions might, perhaps, have been spared—though there is no fault to find on the score of their general interest—and a little more attention bestowed on some of the Bourbons of the second plane, and, notably, on the House of Condé.

To Marie Leczinska, again, if one must indulge in one's little carplings, I think Capt. Bingham scarcely does full justice. Poor Marie Leczinska! When her father, Stanislas Leczinski, the deposed and exiled king of Poland, received Louis XV.'s proposals for his daughter's hand, it is said that he rushed into the room where she and his wife were sitting, and cried, “Let us go down on our knees and thank God.” But, from the first, matters can hardly be said to have gone more than fairly well with the royal couple. She was pretty, rather piquant than beautiful, older than her husband, greatly attached to him; while he, even in the earlier days, if we are to believe what the Maréchal de Villars told the queen herself, did not really love her. So, after she had borne him some ten children or so, he went his way, which, as we all know, was a way not strictly edifying. Whereupon Capt. Bingham observes: “There was this much excuse for Louis XV.: the queen, who was seven years older than himself, was incapable of either amusing or advising him, and the consequence was that in time he grew weary of her society.” “Incapable of amusing him”—I think that is a hard saying. The woman was clever, fond of reading. She knew five languages. With mother-wit she was fully dowered. A mere simpleton she emphatically was not. Let us hear what is said of her by Horace Walpole's friend and strange lover, Mme. du Deffand, whose pen, as a rule, dropped verjuice rather than honey:

“She is very clever, has a kind heart, a sweet temper, and an interesting face. From her education she derives a piety so true that it has become the ruling feeling of her heart. She loves God, and only a little less all that is lovable. She knows how to ally what is pleasant with what is grave. . . . With an extreme sensibility she combines the most admirable purity of conduct, and with the greatest modesty a desire to please so strong that it should of itself insure success. . . . Her discernment is such that she at once perceives failings and follies; but of her goodness and charity she bears them without impatience, and rarely allows herself to indulge in a smile. . . . The respect she inspires springs rather from her virtues than her dignity. It neither chills the soul nor the senses. When speaking to her the minds retains all its freedom, and this springs from the penetration and delicacy of her own mind. She apprehends so quickly, and with such fineness of intuition, that it is easy to impart to her any idea without departing in aught from the circumspection due to her rank.”

“Charming” is one of the adjectives applied to the queen by Mme. du Deffand; and no doubt she failed to charm Louis XV. But was he charmable by such means—all womanly and good—as she had at her disposal? Was he charmable by any means that would have kept his indolent, flaccid, inherently ignoble nature from falling into decay and gangrene? There are certain creatures, as we know, that will not “hear the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely”; and that cannot rightly be set down as the charmer's fault. We should hesitate before making Marie Leczinska responsible for the mean vices, the moral atrophy, of Louis XV.

THE ORIGIN OF PRINTING.

L'Origine Tedesca e l'Origine Olandese dell'Invenzione della Stampa.

La Stampa in Venezia. By C. Castellani. (Venice: Ongania).

A few years ago the question of the place of invention of printing with moveable types seemed to be regarded as settled in favour of Mainz. But, in 1882, Mr. Hessels made a fresh and very effective attack on the Mainz claims, which he followed up in 1887 with a series of letters in the ACADEMY (afterwards reprinted as a volume), maintaining the thesis that Haarlem, not Mainz, was the birthplace of printing. Signor Castellani's pamphlet is in the nature of a reply to Mr. Hessels.

The problem under discussion is briefly as follows. Ancient traditions, of greater or less value, variously ascribe the invention of printing with moveable types to Gutenberg at Mainz or to Coster at Haarlem. The earliest printed books and sheets which we can accurately or approximately date, certainly come from Mainz. On the other hand, the earliest clear account of the invention, printed in the Cologne Chronicle (1499) on the authority of Ulrich Zell, who came out of Mainz, is to the effect that the art was first invented at Mainz in 1440, and was improved during the next ten years, that in 1450 they began to print, and that the first book they set to work on was the (Mazarin) Bible; that though the art, as it is nowadays (i.e., in 1499) employed, was invented at Mainz, “the first prefiguration of it” was invented in Holland “from the Donatuses, which were printed there before that time” (1440). Donatuses, it may be remarked, were little school-books for teaching children grammar.

The question arises—What was this “first prefiguration” which was unlike the art as afterwards developed, and so unlike that, compared with it, the other was a new invention? According to some the “prefiguration” is to be seen in printing done from wood-blocks on which the text was carved. According to others the “prefiguration” is a well-known group of books and sheets (often called “Costeriana”), of which in all forty-seven different ones are known (a list of them is in Hessels's Haarlem, p. 25). All forty-seven are printed with one or another of eight kindred founts of type. Most of them are printed badly, and in what at first sight seems to be a rudimentary style. They might well enough be called a “prefiguration” of the Mainz work so far as style of craftsmanship is concerned, and twenty-one of them are Donatuses. They seem therefore to fit Zell's account very accurately.

There is, however, one serious objection to so regarding them, and this is that we have no internal indication of their being as old as this assumption requires. Five of them (Hessels, 25 and 39—42) contain the name of Pius II., and cannot have been printed till after 1458 and not improbably some years after. We know that one copy of H. 40 was purchased between 1471 and 1474, and another copy is rubricated 1472.

At present no argument has been brought forward which compels and constrains our judgment. We may believe that printing (in the modern sense of the word) was invented at Mainz and thence introduced in a rather crude form into the Low Countries; or we may agree with Mr. Hessels and believe that the Costeriana are of all dates stretching back from 1472 to before 1440. If only Mr. Hessels had not been so anxious to “score off” Dr. Van der Linde, and had written his Haarlem no! Mentis, &c., with a view to the clear statement of his theory and that only, he would have advanced his own cause much more than he has done. Castellani's very clear and unpolemic statement of the opposite case is far more convincing than Mr. Hessels, simply because of its lucidity. He has no difficulty in showing that the consensus of antiquity is in favour of Mainz. Castellani and Hessels should be read as mutually complementary and corrective.

In re-reading Mr. Hessels's articles I have again noticed a serious misrepresentation of one of the late Henry Bradshaw's positions with regard to the question under discussion. Chapter viii. is headed “Were the ‘Costeriana' printed at Utrecht?" and in it is the statement that

"Mr. Bradshaw suggested Utrecht as the place where the Costeriana had been printed, and the period 1471—1474 as the approximate date of their origin."

In Campbell's Annales de la Typographie Néerlandaise (p. 517) there occurs this heading, "La Prototypographie Néerlandaise (à Utrecht?)" That "à Utrecht?" Mr. Bradshaw again and again described to me as a hopeless misconception of his meaning. He said that he did not desire to ascribe the printing of these things to Utrecht or to the date 1471—1474, but that until further evidence arose he was obliged to leave them where he first found them. His words are (Founts of Type, p. 6)—

"I am compelled to leave the Speculum [and its fellows] at Utrecht until I know anything positive to the contrary; because it is at Utrecht that the cuts first appear, cut up into pieces, in a book printed by Veldener at that place in 1481. . . . As the Speculum compels us to place them (the so-called 'Costeriana') at Utrecht, and before 1481, so the Yliada enable us to throw back the date of execution at least to 1471-74."

Thus both Mr. Hessels and Dr. Campbell fail to see Mr. Bradshaw's point. If anyone will take the trouble to read Mr. Bradshaw's Founts of Type (now reprinted in his collected papers), and then Mr. Hessels's Haarlem, he will see the difference between bibliography as an exact science and bibliography of the unreformed, pugnacious school. Mr. Hessels gives reasons for thinking it possible that the "Costeriana," or some of them, were printed at Haarlem. Mr. Bradshaw would say that, however probable this may be, the earliest place in which we actually know, "from printed or written documentary evidence found in the volumes themselves," any of the Costeriana printing materials to have been used is Utrecht. Mr. Hessels has brought forward no evidence admissible in Mr. Bradshaw's eyes to change this state of things. When Mr. Bradshaw left the Costeriana at Utrecht, he did not mean that they were not printed at Haarlem. They may have been. Nobody knows for certain whether they were or not; but some of their apparatus certainly was used at Utrecht, and that is the last certainty we possess.

I have left myself no space to speak of Signor Castellani's pamphlet on the history of Venetian printing. It is in the nature of a sketch of the subject down to the year 1515, when Aldus Manutius died. In the first part the author destroys the Pamfilo Castaldi myth. In the remainder he sketches the outline of the true history. A number of valuable documents from the Venetian archives are printed at the end. Every student of the history of printing should make himself acquainted with the contents of both Signor Castellani's pamphlets.

NEW NOVELS.

Suspense. By Henry Seton Merriman. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

On the Children. By Annie Thomas (Mrs. Pender Cudlip). In 3 vols. (White.)

A Lady Horsebreaker. By Mrs. Conney. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

William Orleigh. By Eamé Hope. In 2 vols. (Remington.)

Dick Chichester. By E. M. Roach. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

Lal. By L. Lathrop and Annie Wake-man. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

A Fairy Godfather. Edited by J. A. Good-child. (Remington.)

MR. MERRIMAN'S Suspense might be described as the apotheosis of the special correspondent. It is all about a very valiant man, Mr. Theodore Trist, whose courage in the field was equal to that of Skobelev, and who at the same time distanced all other newspaper correspondents by the brilliancy of his descriptions and the vigour of his literary style. The author is so enamoured of war correspondents in general that he describes them as soldiers, statesmen, critics, writers, and explorers in one. This novel, of course, is not all about war. There are, in fact, three lady characters in it who are all in love with Trist the incomparable. Mrs. Wylie, the eldest, is the widow of an admiral, and she takes an almost motherly interest in him. Mrs. Houston, his second admirer, is also a widow, but young and beautiful. She compromises herself in order to force a declaration from him. Thirdly, there is Miss Brenda Gilholme, the most charming of the three, who "lets concealment, like a worm in the bud, prey on her damask cheek." Altogether, Theodore's love affairs promise to become very entangling, when the Gordian knot is cut by his death at the siege of Plevna, after an exhibition of conspicuous bravery. Although Mr. Merriman has somewhat overcharged the portrait of his hero, Suspense is a novel of considerable merit. It is excellently written, and contains many passages of genuine interest. On one occasion, when the author is called upon to deal with a scene degrading to human nature, he declines to make his work "realistic."

"There is assuredly nothing to be gained," he remarks, "by dredging human nature, . . . by flaunting the seamy side before the world. This volume may fall into the hands of some young woman, or some youth, to whom man is still something of an ideal. God forbid that any word of mine should dispel illusions which, though they be but hollow, are at least joyous."

Very attenuated in substance is Mrs. Pender Cudlip's On the Children. All three volumes are extremely short; and, even so, the material has been eked out terribly. Add to this that the story has evidently been written in great haste; for on p. 78, vol. iii., Mrs. Roche says to her son, when he tells her of the girl he is going to marry, "This is the first I have heard about her," whereas only some twenty pages before, in the same volume (p. 55), he had fully described her. As its title implies, the novel is concerned with the sins of the fathers and the mothers (perhaps more especially the mothers), and the manner in which they are visited upon the children. A very shady collection the older people are, while among the younger there is an impossible change of character in the pseudo-Lord Rollamore. The Kilburns and the Maunders are good; but they are not sufficient to redeem the story, which is so poor that the sooner it is forgotten the better. Mrs. Pender Cudlip can give us work far superior to this.

A new writer, so far as we remember, greets us in the author of A Lady Horsebreaker, whose book, it may be said at once, deserves a word of cordial welcome. It may seem a little far-fetched to make a heroine of a horsebreaker, but the beauty and attractiveness of Hester Duke would condone a great deal. Two men are in love with her—Archibald Douglas and Geoffrey Travers, the latter a soldier of merit, who has gone through much service. Travers is the lover favoured by the lady, and Douglas "plays it very low down" indeed upon him in order to thwart his plans. Geoffrey goes out to India in despair, and when he returns endeavours to gain the affections of Hester; but she rejects him with scorn, believing him to be actuated by mercenary motives, and little knowing how he has been grossly deceived all through by Douglas. During Travers's absence, the pretty horsebreaker's mother has succeeded to the title of Lady Cairnfall, and to a large income; but of this change in Hester's fortunes Travers is wholly ignorant. In the end everything turns out as it should, but not until there has been a good deal of sifting of character. Mrs. Conney's story is pleasantly and agreeably written.

In our judgment, William Orleigh is a profound mistake. It is a controversial novel pure and simple, and even in the hands of a Scott or a Thackeray such a work must become wearisome. As Miss Hope is neither, her task in dealing with social and theological problems becomes doubly difficult. No doubt it is easy to pick flaws in the character of Robert Elsmere, and sometimes this is skilfully done; but beside him William Orleigh is a poor, if orthodox, creature. Miss Hope is unjust to classes through individuals, and one would be as loth to believe that all Socialists were like old Orleigh as that all believers in the dogmas of the English Church were as priggish as his son. There is a good deal about the disestablishment of the Scotch Church which might well have been relegated to a polemical pamphlet, though it would not have proved very effective even in that form. William Orleigh's fairness and judgment in political matters will be apparent from his remark that a Radical is one "whose political creed blights and destroys all proper feeling." A number of people who figure in this story will be recognised through their thin disguises, and it seems superfluous to speak of the eloquent Canon L—— and the great preacher Mr. S——. Why Aberdeen should appear as "Aderben" is also a mystery.

Another political story confronts us in Dick Chichester, which relates the wooing of a county by the hero in the Conservative interest. What a pity it is that writers will not either leave these debateable questions alone, or treat them merely as portions of the narrative, without bias! Here we have Mr., Mrs., or Miss Roach denouncing the disestablishment of the Irish Church as a sacrilegious act; eulogising Mr. Disraeli's leadership of the Conservative Opposition, and his "grasp of the forces at work in modern life"; and gloating over the resignation of Mr. Gladstone's wicked Ministry in 1874. This is a foolish way of writing novels, when readers naturally include all shades of political opinion. Moreover, all books of such a character, however ably written, can only enjoy an ephemeral reputation. But Diok Chichester is in the unfortunate position of being political without being clever.

The rough, wild life led at San Francisco about half a century ago is strikingly depicted in Lal. The heroine is a little girl made fatherless by one of those tragedies which, in the early days of the settlement of Western America, were of frequent occurrence. The murder is taken up by one Berkeley Howell, who leaves no stone unturned to bring the assassin to judgment. The story is powerfully written, and has many points of interest in addition to the strange incident with which it opens.

A charming volume is A Fairy Godfather, half fairy-tale and half in the vein of the ordinary novel. Mr. Goodchild has a delicate touch, and he occasionally gives utterance to phrases which are very effective.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

SOME TRANSLATIONS.

The Poets and Peoples of Foreign Lands. By J. W. Crombie. (Elliot Stock.) In this pleasant little volume Mr. Crombie has collected five essays on popular poetry. Two of them deal with Andalusia, one with its Arabic the other with its Spanish verse; the third tells of Provence and of Mistral. The two last introduce us to more northern poetry—to the Low German of Klaus Groth of Ditmarsh, and to the Dutch of Van den Wildenborch. In all, excepting that on the Folk-Poetry of Spain—the authors of which are unknown, which seems to grow unconsciously rather than to be spontaneously produced—Mr. Crombie adds to the interest of the poetry biographical details of the author, and thus greatly increases the charm of his essays. As a translator of verse we cannot place him in the very highest rank. There is too much sameness of manner in his versions; he is not literal enough; he constantly puts a more abstract term for a concrete one, and thus misses the force and directness of the original. But we have little fault to find with his critical remarks. He does not exaggerate the merits of his originals. As he justly says, with the exception of the improvised funeral dirges, nearly all popular improvisations are "remarkable for their wit rather than their pathos"; but in well-turned compliment they are often happy. We think that he hardly does justice to Provençal, though we fully assent to the vast superiority of Mistral's "Miréio" over his "Nerto." But the Provençal revival has given birth to the Catalan, and this to the Gallegan; and we cannot see that true poetry is much less likely to arise in these dialects than in French or Spanish. It is indeed most difficult to account for "the subtle sort of beauty" that lurks in dialect. What is it that makes Barnes delightful in his Dorset dialect, while he is below the average in his English poetry? So we are deeply moved by many a song and poem in the patois and dialects of France, while the same rendered into French by their authors leaves us cold and uninterested. Still, masters like Tennyson can please us almost equally in dialect and in the most refined and polished strains of the language. We suggest to the readers of this volume to amuse themselves in trying to explain this little paradox.

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. Translated by Justin Huntly McCarthy. (David Nutt.) It was, perhaps, inevitable that the discovery of such a windfall as the late E. Fitzgerald's Omar Khayyam should lead to a quantity of false enthusiasm. A sort of mystic cult is set up in these cases, and the inner circle claims to have a key to all sorts of secret beauties and truths. Some shock, however, will have been given to the engouement of ardent Umarites by Mr. Huntly McCarthy's prose version of about 1800 stanzas attributed to their oracle. These are as unlike anything to be found in Fitzgerald as Hobbes's Iliad is to Pope's or to the original Homer. If Omar Khayyam was the rollicking ruffianly sot represented in the greater part of these tetrastichs, he need give his heretofore admirers no further concern. It may, however, be permitted to doubt whether he is any more responsible for Mr. McCarthy's work than he was for Fitzgerald's. The book, moreover, is somewhat disfigured by affectation; and the trick of printing, from beginning to end, in nothing but capital letters makes it as fatiguing to read as a type-written MS.

The Dramatic Works of Jean Racine: a Metrical English Version. By R. B. Boswell. Vol. i. (Bell.) It is next to impossible, we imagine, to make Racine really interesting in an English dress. The extreme triteness of the thought conceals itself somewhat, as Mr. Boswell says, under the grace of the original diction. But transposed into English blank verse—even when the thing is done, as here, with a good deal of skill and force—the dramas are wearisome. The "play of contending emotions" seems tame, and the "analytical and argumentative vein" is certainly Euripidean, without the grace and pathos with which Euripides relieved it. Whether Corneille, Molière, and Racine's names can justly be called "not unworthy of comparison with those of Sophocles, Aristophanes, and Euripides," seems to us doubtful. We incline to think that Molière alone can take that rank. The biographical notice prefixed to this volume has the merit of brevity, and is all to the point. Perhaps a little more attempt at sketching Racine's character as well as the incidents of his life would have been welcome. The blank verse is far too monotonous in its cadence: a fault which lies not so much with Mr. Boswell as with the nature of his task—the conversion of rhyming Alexandrines into a metre which is nothing if not varied. Here is a specimen, from the speech of Antigone in "Les Frères Ennemis," act iii., scene 3 ("Je courais pour fléchir Hémon et Polynice").

"I ran to call back Hæmon and your son,
But ere I started they were far ahead;
They heard me not, and vainly did I call
With cries of anguish on the name of each.
They both flew swiftly to the battle-field;
And, as for me, mounting the ramparts' height,
I, with the people there, watch'd in alarm,
That seemed to freeze our blood, the thickening fray."

One can feel the couplets through the blank verse. Sometimes the verse itself halts, as in a later line in the same speech:

"Thus speaks he, and therewith deals the death blow."

But, as a rule, it has vigour without variety. When the dialogue is broken, the bright consciousness of the French is certainly not reproduced—e.g. (act iv., scene 3).

"Joc. Mon fils, son règne plait.
Pol. Mais il m'est odieux.
Joc. Il a pour lui le peuple.
Pol. Et j'ai pour moi les dieux."

"Joc. My son, the people love his rule.
Pol. 'Tis hateful. To me
Joc. They support him.
Pol. And the gods
Back me."

This is altogether ugly. The best passage is, perhaps, the soliloquy of Hermione in "Andromaque," act v., scene 1; indeed, all through this play Mr. Boswell does better than elsewhere. Does he not a little misconceive the French, in rendering (act i., scene 2)

"Hécube près d'Ulysse acheva sa misère."
"Ulysse made the cup of misery O'erflow for Hecuba?"

Ruy Blas. Translated from the French by W. D. S. Alexander. (Digby & Long.) Mr. Alexander dedicates his translation to the memory of Victor Hugo, whom he holds "the greatest French poet of modern days"—a cautiously vague estimate, for "modern" may mean anything, from a decade to two or three centuries. He is right, we think, in rating Ruy Blas highly (see Pref., p. ix); but wholly wrong in seeing in Don Quixote nothing but "the vain-glorious martinet and fop, who brings upon his own head the punishment of his egregious vanity and folly." This is the kind of insight that is sometimes shown by people who see in Don Quixote only an old fool, and in Falstaff only a fat old sensualist. Victor Hugo knew his business too well for this. The translation endeavours to follow the original metre—i.e., it is in rhymed Alexandrines, except of course the song overheard in Act ii. (à quel bon entendre?)—a gem sorely flawed in being "set" in English, and followed by a laughable misprint in the stage direction. The Alexandrines are better; but, somehow, they have not the tragic ring, in English, which they give out in French, e.g. (p. 98):

"Revenge against the Queen! O cruel fate! and must
I in her eyes become an object of disgust—
A vagabond—a villain with a double face—
A perjured hound, dishonouring both name and race!
I shall go mad! With thickening horrors thus surrounded,
Reason seems tottering—is clouded and confounded."

The best scenes in the translation are, we think, those where Don Caesar bears a considerable part. But, owing in the main to its unfamiliar form, the translation could hardly be read by any Englishman with so much pleasure as Mrs. Newton Croeland's version in Bohn's series. There is a bad misprint in l. 15 of p. 148.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW announce that they hope to publish Mr. Stanley's account of his recent expedition in the course of May. The book will be in two volumes, entitled The Darkest Africa: and the Quest, Rescue, and Retreat of Emin, Governor of Equatoria. It will also be issued simultaneously in America, France, Germany, Italy, Spain, and Scandinavia.

WE hear that Mr. George Meredith intends to issue a new novel very shortly.

MR. EDMUND GOSSE's selection from his early volumes of poems, collected under the title of On Viol and Flute, will be published at Easter by Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co. It will be adorned with two original designs—a frontispiece by Mr. L. Alma Tadema and a tail-piece by Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, the execution of which has been the cause of delay in the publication, originally announced for last Christmas.

Messrs. LONGMANS will publish immediately The Seat of Authority in Religion, by Dr. James Martineau. In this work the author attempts to make clear the ultimate ground of pure religion in the human mind, and the permanent element of the religion of Christ in history. It is addressed to the requirements, not of specialists, philosophers, and scholars, but of educated persons interested in the results of modern knowledge.

THE item of chief literary interest in the forthcoming number of the Universal Review is, we understand, an epitome of Count Tolstoy's latest story—as yet unpublished—"The Creutzer Sonata." We are informed that this epitome has been made with Count Tolstoy's sanction and from his original manuscript, and embodies the author's latest corrections. The paper will be illustrated with a reproduction in colours of Kepin's celebrated picture of Count Tolstoy ploughing, and by two photographs of the novelist taken in 1876 and 1886.

THOSE who have been attracted by Mr. Rudyard Kipling's recent contributions to periodical literature, but who have not come across his writings published in India, will be glad to hear that perhaps the best of these—a collection of military stories entitled Soldiers Three—will shortly be issued here by Messrs. Sampson Low.

MR. A. PATCHETT MARTIN has edited a collection of Australian "Bush" stories, which will contain original contributions from Mrs. Campbell-Praed, "Tasma," Mr. Lance, and Messrs. Hume Nisbet, Marriott Watson, Edmund Rawson, and Dr. Mannington Caffyn. The volume, which will be entitled Under the Gum Tree, is in the press, and will shortly be published by Messrs. Trischler & Co.

A POLITICAL and social novel by Lady Florence Dixie, entitled Glortana; or, the Revolution of 1900, will be published shortly by Messrs. Henry & Co.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW have in the press Nelson's Words and Deeds: a Selection from his Despatches and Correspondence, edited by Mr. W. Clark Russell.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN announces, as the first volume of an "Adventure" series, The Adventures of a Younger Son, by E. J. Trelawny, illustrated with several portraits and an autograph letter. Mr. Edward Garnett has written an introduction.

MESSRS. SONNENSCHEIN will publish immediately, under the auspices of the National Radical Union, a second series of Home Rule Speeches, by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain.

THE Clarendon Press will issue shortly a new edition, in royal octavo, of the new series of Lord Chesterfield's Letters, edited by the Earl of Carnarvon, which won a succès d'estime at Christmas. The new edition will contain some additional correspondence in an appendix.

WE are to look for the early appearance of a new edition of the Hon. Roden Noel's Livingstone in Africa, with illustrations by Mr. Hume Nesbit. The volume will include a new poem named "Stanley."

PROF. PIAZZI SMYTH, late astronomer royal for Scotland, has, since his retirement, been engaged at Ripon in revising his remarkable work, Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid. The new edition—the fifth—which is to appear next week, has been largely re-written, and one-third of it is new, containing some important facts bearing on this interesting controversy. The publishers are Messrs. C. Burnet & Co.

Glimpses into Nature's Secrets: or, Strolls on Beach and Down, by Mr. Edward A. Martin, will be published immediately by Mr. Elliot Stock in his "Nature" Series.

THE author of "Women Must Weep" has a new book of poems in the press called Twist Kiss and Lip; or, Under the Sword. It is the record of a poet's thoughts and feelings for a quarter of a century.

THE proprietor of Neal's Library and Messrs. Brentano conjointly announce the immediate issue of the first yearly edition of the Anglo-American Annual, a volume dealing exclusively with the English and American colony in Paris and its neighbourhood. The contents embrace a directory of Anglo-American residents, and professional and commercial houses; information for intending residents, students, and visitors; and the latest reports on all the Anglo-American institutions of Paris—charities, mission work, commerce, and sport.

MISS KATHARINE has written an article for the Providence Sunday Journal on the poetry of Miss Emily Hickey.

MR. C. G. LUZAC and Mr. Th. Wohlleben, who have for some time past occupied positions in the oriental and foreign departments of Messrs. Trübner & Co., have established themselves as foreign and oriental booksellers and publishers in 46 Great Russell Street, opposite the British Museum.

THE Early English Text Society has sent out its first issue for this year, and the extra series are complete: Oaxton's Eneydos (1490), edited by the late Mr. Gully and Dr. Furnivall; and Oaxton's Blanchardyn and Eglantine (circa 1489), edited by Dr. Leon Kellner. Both books have been collated with their French prose originals, and Dr. Kellner has prefixed to his text a very important treatise on Oaxton's syntax and style, over a hundred pages long, with a series of illustrative quotations. In the original series the issue has been the first text for 1890; part iii. of Ælfrio's Metrical Lives of Saints, edited from the Cotton MS. Julius E 7, by Prof. Skeat; and two reprints of the society's earlier publications, to make up for a third text in 1889, Religious Pieces in Prose and Verse, from R. Thornton's MS., edited by the Rev. G. Perry; and the Book of Quinte Essence (alcohol), edited by Dr. Furnivall. The Society's other texts for 1890 and those for 1891 to be issued this year are all in type.

MR. ANDREW LANG will deliver a course of three lectures at the Royal Institution after Easter on "The Natural History of Society."

AT the next meeting of the Ethical Society—to be held at Essex Hall, Strand, on Sunday, March 9, at 7.30 p.m.—the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, will deliver a lecture on "Social Solidarity and Vicarious Sin."

THE new volume of the Collected Writings of De Quincey (Edinburgh: A. & O. Black) has for frontispiece a not very effective reproduction of the portrait by Sir J. Watson Gordon, in the National Portrait Gallery; and on the title-page a cut of Charles Lamb. The contents are described as "Biographies and Biographic Sketches," so as to include reviews of Dr. Parr's Works and Lives of Charlemagne and Joan of Arc. The only paper which has not already appeared in De Quincey's Collected Works is an early sketch of Prof. Wilson, which is now reprinted from the Edinburgh Literary Gazette of 1829.

FOLLOWING a laudable example, the proprietors of the Bristol Mercury have commemorated their centenary by issuing a facsimile reprint of their first number, which appeared on March 1, 1790; and also a facsimile of a news-sheet with the same name published in 1716. Not the least notable thing about these facsimiles is that they have been prepared by Messrs. Caalon, who supplied the founts from which the newspaper was first printed in 1790, and who further, on the foundation of their firm in 1716, copied the Dutch types from which the newspaper of that year was printed.

WE have received, in the form of a pamphlet, a review of Mr. H. T. Mackenzie Bell's memoir of Charles Whitehead, reprinted from the Australasian of May 18, 1889. The author of the review knew Whitehead during the closing years of his life at Melbourne; and he here quotes two letters which painfully illustrate the straits to which this "forgotten genius" was reduced. One of them, it may be added, shows R. H. Horne in a not very pleasant light.

THE last Bulletin of the Boston (U.S.) Public Library contains an appendix by the librarian, Mr. Mellen Chamberlain, which describes (with facsimiles) a curious documentary fragment containing the name of Shakspeare. It was found in a paper fold in the binding of a copy of North's Plutarch (1603), purchased in 1880 from Mr. Samuel Gasking, who described himself as a proof-reader from London. The inscription runs, "Wilm. Shakspeare hundred and twenty pounds"; and there are also written, in similar handwriting, the Latin words, "quod natura dedit tollere nemo potest" and "cur honor quaeris." Mr. Chamberlain does not attempt to argue that it is an autograph of Shakspeare; but he does maintain that the paper, ink, and handwriting are all of the early part of the seventeenth century, and contemporary with the first binding of the volume.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

IN view of the sale of "an extremely comprehensive and valuable collection of MSS.," the Council of the Senate at Cambridge propose that £5000 from the funds in the hands of the Syndics of the Press be placed at the disposal of the Library Syndicate during the years 1890 and 1891 for the purchase of valuable MSS.

ARCHDEACON WATKINS, of Durham, began last Sunday his course of Bampton lectures at Oxford. His subject is "The Attacks made by Modern Critics on the Fourth Gospel."

BOTH Oxford and Cambridge have during the past week voted grants of books to the library of Toronto University, which was recently destroyed by fire.

MR. ARTHUR J. EVANS, the keeper of the Ashmolean, announces two public lectures on "Some old Venetian (Illyrio-Italic) Influences on Belgic Gaul and Pre-Roman Britain."

THE Hon. G. C. Brodrick, warden of Merton College, will deliver a course of three lectures at the Royal Institution during April on "The Place of Oxford University in English History."

MR. JAMES WILLIAMS—who is known in literature by one or two volumes of graceful verse, and also by his articles on legal subjects in the Encyclopædia Britannica—has been elected to an official fellowship at Lincoln, thus returning to his old college after an absence of some sixteen years. Mr. Williams, we may add, rowed in the Oxford eight of 1874.

As a result of the conversion of Consols, the question of re-investment in securities bearing a higher rate of interest has been discussed at both Oxford and Cambridge. The first practical step seems to have been taken at the latter university, where the Syndics of the Press have been empowered to sell so much of the Consols standing to their account as will purchase £4000 four per cent. debenture stock of the London and North Western Railway.

It has been decided that the "Ion" of Euripides shall be the next Greek play to be acted at Cambridge; and as the pecuniary results of the recent performance of "Stratford" were not altogether satisfactory, the Oxford Magazine suggests that a play of Aristophanes, such as "The Wasps," should be tried at Oxford.

THE Clarendon Press will shortly publish a second edition, revised and enlarged, of the Rev. W. D. Macray's Annals of the Bodleian Library.

At the meeting of the Cambridge Philological Society held this week, Prof. Postgate was to read a paper on "The Declension of u Stems in Latin, with Special Reference to the Theories set forth by Stolz, Henry, and King and Cookson."

THE Curators of the Taylor Institution, Oxford, intend shortly to nominate a teacher of the Spanish language on that foundation. The emoluments will amount to at least £200 a year. The teacher appointed will be required to enter on the discharge of his duties at the beginning of Michaelmas term. Candidates are requested to send their names, with testimonials, on or before May 1.

THE first edition of Echoes from the "Oxford Magazine" has been exhausted within six weeks of publication; but a reprint will be ready in a few days.

In accordance with a power given by the Scottish Universities Act of last session, Dundee College has been affiliated to St. Andrews—the youngest to the oldest academic body in Scotland. Each retains its own endowments; but the professors at Dundee are admitted to the senate of St. Andrews.

THE second Prince of Travancore—who comes of a family distinguished for their intellectual attainments—has passed the B.A. examination at Madras. This is said to be the first example of an Indian prince graduating at an Indian University.

SIGNOR BONGHI's sketch of "Ignazio v. Döllinger" in the Nuova Antologia for February 16 will be read with interest. Noteworthy is his reference to the old scholar's magnificent library, the produce of the savings of a self-denying life, and of many years' hunts in bookstalls, which its owner himself regarded as the choicest in all Europe in the fields of history and theology. Another valuable paper of reminiscences of Döllinger is contributed by Dr. Plummer, of Durham University, to the March number of the Expositor.

Correction.—In the obituary notice of Prof. Lorimer in the ACADEMY of March 1, p. 161, l. 5, for "January" read "February"; p. 161, l. 16 from bottom, for "Transactions" read "translations"; p. 152, l. 16, for "physiological" read "psychological."

OBITUARY.

FRANZ DELITZSCH.

ONE of the strongest links between England and Germany has been broken: the man whom England, even more than Germany, honoured as a foremost Protestant theologian has passed away. The varied stores of learning and culture which Frank Delitzsch possessed may some day be equalled in that all but ideal critic whom all parties alike hope for but who has not yet emerged from his Lehrjahre. But shall we again see that peculiar combination of seemingly disparate elements which fascinated one in the simply devout, but ever, within certain limits, restlessly critical author or editor of Philemon and Iris, the Hebrew New Testament, and so many great commentaries on the Scriptures? Many English and American readers will certainly feel as if they had lost a personal friend, and one who could not only direct their studies but elevate their spiritual life.

Delitzsch, at any rate, has not been cut off prematurely, like Ritschl in Germany, and too large a band of still progressive scholars in England. He died at Leipzig on March 3, 1890. He was born in the same town on February 23, 1813. It has often been said that he was of Jewish extraction. Some of his own students have professed to have heard this from himself. Yet the report is not to be credited. Delitzsch was pleased at being thought to have derived from the Jewish literature, of which he was almost a lifelong student, some of the finest of the old Jewish characteristics. But this was all. It was from two missionaries of the London Jewish Missionary Society that he received an impulse towards a thorough study of Hebrew and of Judaism. The nature of this impulse gave a tone to his whole life. In his last years he felt that his chief work was first to complete, and then to revise, with the help of both English and German scholars (notably Dr. Driver of Oxford), his Hebrew version of the New Testament; and he devoted a part of his leisure to directing a modest seminary for the preparation of missionaries to the Jews. The spirit in which he guided this enterprise needs, perhaps, only to be better known to commend itself to English friends of Jewish missions, which have, as some think, not sufficiently participated in the general elevation of tone characteristic of present-day missions to non-Christian races. But his great Hebrew teacher was not a missionary, but an eminent Jewish scholar, Julius Fürst, the lexicographer whose collaborator he was in the preparation of his Hebrew Concordance, and from whom he derived some questionable opinions from which in later years he shook himself free (see his Jesurun sive Isagoge in grammaticam et lexicographiam linguæ hebraicæ, Grimmae, 1838).

In 1850 Delitzsch received a call to the university of Erlangen, where he lectured with much success for sixteen years, one of his contemporaries being the well-known Hofmann, author of the Schriftbeweis. It was at Erlangen that the first edition of his Genesis appeared, which came to a fourth edition in 1872, and a fifth, in which the title was changed to Neuer Commentar über die Genesis, in 1887. This book, which had long been regarded by its author as the least satisfactory of his works, may now be considered in some respects his "last will and testament" to Churchmen and to scholars. For Churchmen, be it said in passing, he was in a very full sense. In 1859-60 his great work on the Psalms first appeared. This, too, has been immensely revised and corrected (the words are not too strong) in the later editions, of which the fourth and last came out in 1883. Job appeared in 1864, and reached a second edition in 1876; Proverbs in 1873; Song of Songs and Kohelah in 1875; Isaiah in 1886, of which the fourth edition, durchaus neugearbeitet, reached Dr. Driver's hands and mine from "der alte Delitzsch" with a dedication which we may well regard as the greatest honour we have received. I spare the reader a list of all this good and great man's publications, and a criticism of his peculiar critical and theological position. The ACADEMY has from time to time given due notice of his works from its commencement in 1869.

It must have been in 1870 that I first made his acquaintance, having no other introduction than my first work on Isaiah. Since then our intercourse has never been long interrupted, and frequent divergences of opinion have made no difference in our mutual regard and religious sympathy. England, too, was very dear to him; and he hoped that, in the necessary breach with the past which critical and scientific progress demands, the inheritance of Christian truth and sentiments would sustain no essential diminution. His life was full of work and of honour; it was not, however, without keen sorrows. One of his sons died in consequence of the fatigues of the great war. Another son, Prof. Friedrich Delitzsch, still lives, and is a distinguished teacher of Assyriology. It is in no small degree owing to him that Franz Delitzsch's commentaries are so full of accurate Assyriological illustrations of Biblical passages.

T. K. CHEYNE.

Leipzig: March 4, 1890.

This morning at six o'clock, Prof. Franz Delitzsch passed peacefully away. He was born at Leipzig in 1813. His education at Leipzig culminated in the degree of doctor of philosophy, and he became a Privatdocent here. After serving as an ordinary professor of theology at Rostock from 1848 to 1850, and at Erlangen from 1850 to 1867, he returned to Leipzig, where he has since been one of the mainstays of the theological faculty. During the holidays last summer, a painful illness threw him upon the couch which he was only to leave for the bier.

No other German theologian since Tholuck has enjoyed to such a degree as Delitzsch the respect of Christians in Great Britain and America, and no other has exerted so great an influence upon theology in those lands. In Erlangen he gathered a circle of English-speaking students about him, and in the last few years at Leipzig such a society formed a regular part of his work. Many a pastor and professor in distant lands will mourn his death. He delighted to bring together around his hospitable board the foreign students, and to emphasise the union of the world in these studies.

Delitzsch worked almost unceasingly. The writer has known him well for more than sixteen years, and can testify from personal observation to his extreme economy of time from early morning until bedtime. Even during this last illness, only unconsciousness could pall his desire to work. On February 23, his seventy-seventh birthday, he was very weak; but when the writer called in the afternoon, he had rallied a little, and was busy at work propped up in bed. His last book, Messianic Prophecies, has just appeared.

His funeral is to take place on Friday at two o'clock, in the University Church, St. Paul's.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for March contains, besides Dr. Plummer's sketch of Döllinger, referred to elsewhere, the conclusion of Bishop Lightfoot's lecture-essay on the "Internal Evidence for the Authenticity and Genuineness of St. John's Gospel." Dr. Milligan gives the first part of a series of papers on St. Paul's argument for the Resurrection of the Dead. Dr. Bruce concludes his study of the "more excellent ministry" of the Christian's High Priest (Hebrew viii. 6). Prof. Cheyne gives a survey of Psalms cxiii.-cxviii., taking them as Maccabean, and urging the importance of the Maccabean period. Prof. Beet continues his sketch of St. Paul's doctrine on "the fate of those who die unsaved." Notes on 1 Corinthians, xv. 29, and Psalms xlv. 7, by Mr. Millard and the late Prof. Elmalie, close the number.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN UNKNOWN MS. OF DANTE IN THE BODLEIAN.
Oxford: March, 1, 1890.

An interesting discovery has just been made by Mr. Madan of a MS. of the Divina Commedia in the Bodleian Library, which does not appear in any of the Catalogues or Indices. It may interest some readers of the ACADEMY to have a brief account of it.

It is unfortunately in a most fragmentary condition, as will appear from the following summary of its contents. It begins at Inf. xviii. 115 ("E mentre ch'io") and goes on continuously (allowing for sheets misplaced in binding) as far as Inf. xxvii. 120. The next fragment is Purg. Canto i. (misplaced however); then Purg. iii. 10 to vii. 3; next Purg. xiii. 19, to xxvi. 69; and finally Purg. xxvii. 79 to Par. xxvii. 105. Thus fully one-third of the poem is missing.

The MS. is in folio, two columns on a page (with one or two exceptions), and generally about thirteen terzine in a column. It is on paper, the quality of which, as well as the handwriting of the MS. itself, certainly indicate a fourteenth-century date, and I should say circa 1380.*

The writing is very clear and regular, with scarcely any erasures (except several by a disperis, chiefly in the Paradiso), and the letters are quite upright. The number of leaves occupied by these fragments is sixty.

The text does not appear to stand in any marked relationship to any special type, so far as could be judged from such test-passages as I have examined in the surviving fragments, which unhappily do not include some of the most striking and important Cantos. The following peculiarities may be worth recording in respect of some passages of which I have the collation in from 150 to 200 MSS. Where no note is added the reading is, so far as my knowledge goes, unique.

Inf. xxi. 112.—Ier cinque ore prima che, &c. This, which I have seen only once before, is clearly wrong, since the hour of our Lord's death was five hours later not earlier, as another reading (also met with once only) sets forth with at least correctness of fact "Ier cinque ore più tardi che," &c.

Inf. xxiii. 83.—Coll' animo nel viso. This seems to be a unique (and quite unmeaning) variation of this much-tortured line, of which I have noted no less than fourteen other forms:

Purg. i. 108.—E più leve salita.

Purg. xvi. 145.—Oci spati (in two others).

Purg. xix. 34.—Io mossi gli occhi al buon Maestro e mentre. Also unique, where over twenty forms of the line occur.

Purg. xxi. 19.—E mentre andava (in two others).

Purg. xxi. 25.—Ma per colcol.

Par. xvi. 47.—Tra portar arme.

Par. xviii. 75.—Or tonda o larga schiera (one other only).

Par. xxii. 95.—Più fo il mar fuggir (three others only).

Par. xxvi. 134.—Ia. (sic) s'appellava.

In the following passages the readings found are also unique, but I have not the record of more than twenty-five to thirty MSS.

Purg. iii. 50.—La più alta ruina (24 MSS. examined gave ten forms of this line).

Purg. iv. 93.—Giù si va per nave.

Purg. xxvi. 27.—Ch'appariva ancora (instead of ch'appare or ch'appare).

Purg. xxvii. 108.—E me lo verace appaga! (a peculiarly audacious change).

Par. iii. 54.—Ool sol infiammati! (ditto).

Par. xiii. 18.—Andasse prima e l'altropoi (usually al prima [or primo] e l'altro al poi).

Par. xiv. 21.—Levan la luce (one other only).

When one or two other MSS. (as above) exhibit the same peculiar reading as these fragments, they are generally different ones, and so no definite relationship can, without further study, be established; nor does this text appear to exhibit any special features, either of value or peculiarity, so far as this hurried examination goes.

* Since writing the above I have sent a drawing of the watermark of the paper to Mr. Maunde Thompson, and he reports it as belonging to the year 1377.

The volume contains also four vellum leaves of smaller size, on which are written, in a fifteenth-century hand, and with very beautifully illuminated initial letters, some sonnets and a canzone of Petrarch; also the last page (fifteenth-century paper and writing) of the "Celestial Revelations" of Sta. Brigida, containing only a few lines and the colophon.

E. MOORE.

THE DATE OF THE RUTHWELL CROSS.

Cambridge: March 4, 1890.

As it seems not improbable that the letter of Prof. Cook in the ACADEMY of last week may lead to some discussion about the date of the Ruthwell Cross, I venture to mention briefly now what I had intended to state at greater length some time hence.

I spent a considerable time last autumn in examining parts of the upper stone, which is about five feet six inches long, let into the top of the great shaft twelve feet long with a tongue of stone. I have always been a little sceptical about the Kadmon mac fauetho on the topmost key, but the mac fauetho is certainly there. The Kadmon I could not make out. For reasons which I could scarcely explain without going into technicalities, I could not be clear about the d or the m. Rejecting the Kadmon, I endeavoured to decipher the runes otherwise, with this very curious result, which those who know runes will follow with ease. The a I took to be a part of e, the left member of the d completing the letter; d followed; and then mo as a blind rune, like the mac on the other border. Thus I got, without at all intending to do so, KEDMON. I am told that "Kedmon" with a long e is a better form than "Kadmon" or "Kaedmon." On the neck of the Cross I found runes which I read -essus, the Bewcastle Gesusus, Jesus.

The runes which Prof. George Stephens and others print as . . . dægisgeaf, and give up as hopeless, have a small blank space after them. My rubbings and squeezes detect in this blank space the remains of the rune for t. Taking g for c, as elsewhere on the Cross, this gives us gisceaf, and I am told that this will do for "creation." On another border, heretofore treated as without runes, I read . . . egalga. Now, in the opening part of the "Dream of the Holy Rood" these two words are brought into close connexion, in two consecutive lines: "That was no outcast's gallows [fræodes gealga], angel creation [gesceaf] gazed upon it." I suggest that this was the original cross, and the original inscription was an assertion that the Christian cross was no malefactor's gallows. There is just room on the edges of this upper part of the Cross for runes as many as there are in this stanza of the "Dream," cutting out such letters as the s in gealga and other letters which indicate a later date and a different province in the Vercelli MS. Whatever the Kedmon mac fauetho may have meant, I should apply it to this part of the Cross. I suggest, further, that at some later period the people determined to set their Cross on high; and so they took it from its stone socket, and cut a great shaft twelve feet high, into the top of which they fitted it, and on this lower shaft they cut the runes which give the elaboration of the idea that the cross of Christ was not a malefactor's gallows. The style of the sculpture on the two shafts is well known to differ considerably. The bearing of this on the date of some of the forms of words on the lower shaft is obvious.

There are runes on another face of this upper cross, as a writer in the ACADEMY stated two or three years ago, apparently Latin words in runic letters. I may add that the Latin word on a border across this upper shaft—which has not, so far as I know, been deciphered—seems to me to read induntum, as though for in dominium, with reference to the figure in the panel above, which has orbs, or something else, “under his feet.” A previous visitor had actually scratched some of the incisions with his penknife.

I cannot write this without expressing the deep regret with which I heard of the death of Mr. McFarlan, the minister of Ruthwell, a few days after my visit. It was by his energy and true love for the priceless relic he had in his charge that the Ruthwell Cross, which was perishing, is now safely housed in an aisle of the church built to receive it. A memorial of some kind in his honour is to be agreed upon next week at Dumfries. Subscriptions may be sent to Mr. A. Johnstone Douglas, Comlongon Castle, Ruthwell, N.B.

G. F. BROWNE.

MRS. MARY FITTON AND SHAKSPERE'S SONNETS
London: March 8, 1890.

Mary Fitton was, it seems, according to Mrs. Stopes's letter in last week's ACADEMY, a confiding damsel who loved William Herbert not wisely but too well. He, however, in a manner worthy of that sex who “were deceivers ever,” betrayed her confidence under a promise of marriage, and then basely deserted her. Even so far, it is not easy to bend the known facts into conformity with Mrs. Stopes's theory; but when we are asked to believe that, after the public scandal occasioned by the birth of Mrs. Fitton's bastard son, and the queen's threat to send her to the Tower, she was in the very next year re-instated openly in the royal favour, Mrs. Stopes makes a demand with which, I should imagine, few readers will be able to comply. Whatever the real gravity of Mary Fitton's fault, she had committed the very serious social offence, especially in the case of a woman, of being “found out.” This offence was not likely to be at once condoned at the court of Elizabeth, whatever might be done elsewhere. Who was the “Mistress Mary” who danced before the queen with such signal success in December, 1602, it may not be possible now to determine certainly. There was another “Mistress Mary” at court about this time; and there may have been several. That this one was not Mary Fitton is shown pretty clearly by the Record Office document (circ. October, 1602) which gives Mrs. Martin's testimony, and speaks of Mrs. Fitton's favour at court as a thing of the past.

Mrs. Stopes's desire to extenuate Mary Fitton's fault has undoubtedly induced her to travel beyond the record. Sir Edward Fitton's letter of May, 1601, does not contain the least hint of a promise of marriage; but, if there had been any such promise, we may feel reasonably sure that Sir Edward would not have failed to mention it, alluding, as he evidently does, to a project of marriage which had been previously entertained.

His daughter he “fears” has been “beguiled,” but beguiled either by Herbert's noble rank, or the superior virtue of his “honesty.” It is this ironical allusion to Herbert's “honesty,” together with what precedes, which discloses the reason Herbert alleged for refusing to marry Mrs. Fitton. She was not an “honest” woman. And this allegation is entirely in accordance with the emphatic way in which he had, according to Cecil, some three months before, and previous to the birth of the child, “utterly renounced all marriage.” Mrs. Stopes may possibly reply that the allegation of “dishonesty” was only another proof of Herbert's baseness, and that many other “gay deceivers” have made, in like circumstances, similar allegations. But, whatever Mrs. Stopes may protest to the contrary, unbiassed inquirers will scarcely judge of this matter without taking into account Mrs. Fitton's subsequent aberrations.

In identifying Mary Fitton with the dark lady of the Sonnets, the indications of her unchastity are no doubt important; but to judge of the probability of the identification it is necessary to look at the chain of evidence as a whole, with its numerous coincidences. There is, first, the suitability of the identification chronologically. Then, the lady of the Sonnets was of such social standing as to justify the expression, “proud of this pride” (151), and she not only could play dexterously on the virginal, but her soft and tender hands gave evidence of immunity from manual toil (128). This, however, may very well have been true of many other women. Till lately it was said that there was no evidence that Mary Fitton had that dark complexion and those black eyes and hair which come out with such prominence in the Sonnets. But this objection is now altogether set aside by the Gawsworth monument. Mrs. Stopes's supposition that the Gawsworth representation may be “allegorical” is one on which it is not necessary for me to comment. The dark lady again wooed Shakspeare's friend (41, 143, 144), and was guilty, as the cause of Shakspeare's fault (151). So Mrs. Fitton, according to Tobie Matthews's letter of March 25, 1601, was the “cause” of Herbert's getting into trouble—a statement, by the way, not very consistent with Mrs. Stopes's contention about the promise of marriage and seduction, but entirely in accordance with Mrs. Martin's testimony as to Mrs. Fitton's taking off her head-tire, tucking up her clothes, putting on a great white cloak, and marching off to meet Herbert, “as though she had been a man.” This testimony is that of a woman, and cannot well be ascribed by Mrs. Stopes to the invention of base, perfidious man.

It would be, of course, desirable to obtain (if this could be procured) some explicit testimony as to relations between Mrs. Fitton and Shakspeare. I should doubt, however, whether such testimony will ever be obtained, though it is, of course, impossible to say what Elizabethan documents may still lurk in out-of-the-way corners unnoticed and unknown. But, failing this, the evidence of Kemp's Dedication is very important; and it is scarcely possible in any way to resist the inference of the Rev. W. A. Harrison (ACADEMY, July 5, 1884) that Mary Fitton must have been acquainted with Shakspeare. True, by the mistake of some one, Anne was substituted for Mary. But, in addition to the evidence we had previously, that there was no Anne Fitton, maid of honour to the queen, as the Dedication states, we now know, from the evidence of the Stepney register, that Anne Fitton had been married to John Newdigate at the early age of twelve; and, in consequence, she could not possibly have been maid of honour in 1600.

But, together with the inference to be drawn from Kemp's Dedication, there is another very interesting piece of evidence to which sufficient attention has not been given. I allude to the quarto of Love's Labour's Lost, published in 1598, “corrected and augmented,” “as it was presented before her Highness [i.e. the queen] this last Christmas.” The play has a curious affinity with the Sonnets, and this in the part of the play (act iv., scene 3) which was pretty evidently modified greatly in order to the representation at court. This is more particularly the case with regard to Rosaline and her dark complexion and black hair and eyes. Rosaline, there is reason to believe, had been originally described as “whitely” (act iii., scene 2) like the Rosaline of “Romeo and Juliet,” who was “white” and “pale,” though with “black eyes” (act ii., scene 4). If the play was altered so that the Princess might correspond better with the queen, and the Princess's attendant (Rosaline) with the brunette Mary Fitton, we need have no difficulty in understanding the resemblance between the Sonnets and the play. It was Hermann Isaac who suggested (Shakspeare Jahrbuch, 1884) that Shakspeare celebrated his brunette lady-love both in the Sonnets and the play, “and had her praise expressed by Biron, his own dramatic representative.” Very likely at the court representation Shakspeare appeared in the character of Biron.

Then there is the mention, in the Hatfield letters, of Mary Fitton's marriage-portion and of the difficulty as to paying it over to her, on the alleged ground that there was no sufficient discharge, as though there were someone in the background who might afterwards come forward and claim the money. This pretext would be accounted for by a previous marriage, which had been set aside or treated as null and void. In the Sonnets there is apparently no husband to interfere between the lady and her numerous admirers. Yet the lady is reminded that “in act” (that is, in accordance with Elizabethan usage, “in fact”) she had broken her marriage vow (152). This statement would agree with a marriage having been legally set aside, though the plighted troth remained. As to the early age at which the marriage must have taken place, it should be remembered that, as already mentioned, Anne Fitton was married at twelve.

There is, besides, the mention of the “name” in Sonnet 151. Some critics of my recent work on the Sonnets have thought my suggestion that the name was “Fitton” extravagant. It is clear, however, that in Elizabethan times “fit” and “fitness” were used in a special sense entirely suitable to this place, as may be seen also from the saying which Cloten quotes in “Cymbeline” (iv. 1).

As to the conclusion towards which the evidence collectively points, there is, I think, little room for doubt. The main difficulty arises from prejudices and prepossessions with regard to Shakspeare's moral character and other matters.

THOMAS TYLER.

WINTER DARKNESS IN ICELAND.

Kewwick: March 1, 1890.

A courteous correspondent, Mr. A. C. Waters, calls my attention to an astronomical slip in my novel about Iceland. He says that I must be wrong in supposing that there could be fifty days of actual darkness on Grimsey Island.

“Grimsey being,” he says, “on the Arctic circle the sun would just show above the horizon even on mid-winter day. On November 1 [the day on which I cause the darkness to begin], the sun is 14½° south of the equator. At 66½° north latitude the equator rises 23½° above the horizon at the southern point. So at noon on November 1 the sun would be 9° above the horizon—about two-fifths as high as he is to us in London at noon on mid-winter day.”

My correspondent is no doubt right as to the astronomical position (many readers must have noticed my mistake), and I must so alter what I have written as to show that the darkness is not due to the total absence of the sun. But it is a fact that darkness like that of night, darkness that may be called perpetual, is sometimes experienced at Grimsey. Icelanders told me at Reykjavik that even at that southerly point a mid-winter day lasted only two or three hours; and I gathered that at Akureyri, almost the most northerly point of the Icelandic mainland, the light of day for about a fortnight before and after the sun begins its northward journey (December 21) is often about equal to that of London in a November fog. Fifty days of darkness might easily come to Grimsey, because of the thick mists and heavy clouds that nearly always encircle it.

Pardon me if this letter is of less than sufficient literary interest.

SCIENCE.

The Origin of Human Reason. By St. George Mivart. (Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.)

BEFORE discussing the contents of this volume I wish to make a personal explanation. Complaining of certain criticisms on his recent work On Truth, Prof. Mivart asserts that "the carelessness or dishonesty of one reviewer has actually gone so far as to represent our definition of true or intellectual perception (given at p. 223) as being that which we have given (at p. 201) as our definition of mere sense perception" (p. 195 of the present work).

No names are given, which, I think, is rather a mistake when one is bringing such a charge as that quoted. However, I have, unfortunately, some reason for believing that the reference is to myself. In reviewing Prof. Mivart's work On Truth, in the ACADEMY for May 11, 1889, I certainly made a mistake closely resembling that complained of. My words were:

"He holds the . . . view that we apprehend things in themselves with the help of our senses, but by a process which is neither sensation nor an inference from our sensations; and he asserts that this process, which he calls perception, is as trustworthy as it is 'inexplicable' (p. 218). Elsewhere we find perception defined as 'a power of grouping clusters of present sensations and associating imaginations therewith' (p. 201), which is exactly what the idealists say, and which makes the whole process clear enough."

On again going over the passages referred to and comparing them with others of the same drift, I find that Prof. Mivart does, as he says, distinguish these two "perceptions" by occasionally calling the one "intellectual" and the other, where he defines it, "sensuous." I wish he had drawn attention to the mistake when my article first appeared, and thus given me a better opportunity for making him amends. It would have been time enough to talk about possible "dishonesty" had I refused to admit my mistake. Careless it certainly was to omit the important qualification "sensuous" from the definition of perception quoted as given on p. 201; and I now express my regret for having supposed that my author was so inconsistent with his own philosophy as to deviate for a moment into what I consider the only sound psychological theory. At the same time I must express my opinion that to call by the same generic name two things so unlike as a faculty which reveals to us by some inexplicable process the existence of external objects, and a mere power of associating sensations and imaginations, is illogical and misleading, especially when there are philosophers who regard the second process as alone constituting perception.

Perhaps, after all, the reviewer may consider himself fortunate in being let off with an alternative between carelessness and dishonesty when he finds his author charging certain unnamed philosophical writers with dishonesty of the most flagrant and unqualified description. There are, he tells us, persons who "disingenuously seek to hide their really crass materialism behind a carefully painted idealistic mask. A solemn profession of idealism, made with the tongue in the cheek, enables its professors to throw dust in the eyes of anyone who may approach to inspect their proceedings too closely. Such men are enabled, by assuming the snowy fleece of an ovine philosophy to ravage the student flock very much at their own sweet will" (pp. 194-5).

Were I to imitate the style of Prof. Mivart, I should say that here, through the mask of modern science, we can discern the sinister visage of the persecuting theologian, who, not being able to torture and burn those who differ from him in opinion, tries to discredit them by baseless charges of hypocrisy and fraud. Possibly I should be talking nonsense, but it would be no worse nonsense than he talks himself. What he expects us to believe is that there are persons with sufficient intelligence to distinguish one philosophical system from another, with sufficient credit to obtain some share in the training of students and sufficient authority to influence their opinions, yet at the same time so perversely stupid and so gratuitously mendacious as to disguise a materialism, which nobody need now be either afraid or ashamed to profess, under cover of an idealism which nearly everybody still regards as either affected, or ridiculous, or insane. The very first step of the deceiver would be to show that our conceptions of matter, when probed to the bottom, presuppose the existence of consciousness, and thus to bar the way against the admittance of his own secret belief that matter is the absolute primum. And even were some of the student flock "ovine" enough to succumb to this naïf method, whatever praise or profit resulted from its success would accrue not to him but to his more candid neighbour who had been teaching undisguised materialism from the beginning.

The present volume is, as its second title implies, not a dogmatic treatise on the origin of human reason—the author's work On Truth has told us at sufficient length what he has to say about that; but a critical "examination of recent hypotheses concerning it," or rather of the Darwinian hypothesis only, and of that only as set forth by Mr. Romanes in his recent work on Mental Evolution in Man. That Prof. Mivart should reply to Mr. Romanes was to be expected, as that gentleman had expressly referred to him as "the most competent as well as the most representative of my opponents." He need not, however, assume, as he seems to do, that every reference to opponents on the part of Mr. Romanes must be aimed at himself; nor does his own disclaimer of nominalism (p. 276) prove that another eminent opponent of Darwinism, Prof. Max Müller, is not responsible for all legitimate deductions from nominalism. It may be added that Prof. Max Müller's Science of Thought well deserved a more extended criticism at Prof. Mivart's hands than what it receives in his share of a correspondence with its author, reprinted from Nature in the present volume. There is, indeed, a sort of triangular duel going on among the three controversialists named, each receiving and returning a double fire. The two professors agree in their hostility to Darwinism; the two naturalists agree in maintaining, as against their philological adversary, that reason may exist independently of language; while the two more modern-minded thinkers would join forces against the Catholic champion when he derives human reason not from language, but from a separable spiritual principle. But it is on Mr. Romanes that the heaviest brunt of battle has fallen so far; and it is to him that the philosophical world must primarily look for a rejoinder to the formidable discharge of Prof. Mivart. And, momentous as is the question on which the two antagonists have joined issue, their controversy seems to me to be, in its present stage, of private and personal rather than of general interest. It may suit Prof. Mivart to talk as if Darwinism stood or fell with the particular line of advocacy adopted by Mr. Romanes, and to lavish compliments on an opponent whom he is confident of having overthrown; but, unless I am very much deceived, Darwinians as a school would refuse to stake their convictions on the dialectical success of that lucid and accomplished writer. A great deal of the present volume seems to be taken up with arguments not indeed ad hominem, but, if one may so speak, ab homine, that is, with proving at most that Mr. Romanes has quite misunderstood the author's theories of conception and judgment, and, therefore, cannot extract from them admissions favourable to his own psychology. A great deal also merely goes to prove that the facts cited by Mr. Romanes in support of his views admit of an opposite interpretation. Some stories about animal intelligence are discredited; and one about a cockatoo is not undeservedly rejected as a ridiculous fable. It might, perhaps, be retorted that the author reads much more philosophy into the expressions of deaf mutes, savages, and rustics than they can really be made to yield. The various arguments are not only stated at considerable length, but are supplemented by copious references to the author's work On Truth. I may perhaps be allowed to hint that the treatise so called, however great may be its value, is not precisely an inspired document, and that its obiter dicta cannot be taken as at once and for ever deciding disputed points in philosophy. Thus, when a reader finds it stated on p. 54 of the present volume that the idea of extension "can exist apart from sensations of touch or of muscular effort, for it may be revealed by sight alone," and remembers how emphatically the contrary proposition has been urged by Messrs. Spencer and Bain, it will hardly satisfy him to ascertain, by the help of a footnote, that the same statement has already been made in the same words on p. 106 of its predecessor without the slightest shadow of an argument to support it.

Prof. Mivart, who is so very impatient of being misunderstood, is quite capable, when he turns reviewer, of grossly misunderstanding—I will not say misstating—his opponent's case. Here is an instance. Mr. Romanes, in Mental Evolution in Man, referring to self-consciousness, observes that "the greatest of all distinctions in biology" when it first arises is thus seen to lie in its potentiality rather than in its origin" (op. cit., p. 233). The sentence is a slovenly one; but when read, as it ought to be read, in connexion with what follows it is perfectly clear. Self-consciousness is the condition to a vast mental superiority in men over other animals, but only in its more developed forms. On its first emergence it betokens but a slight mental superiority on the part of its possessor. Prof. Mivart, however, cites his opponent as saying that the greatest of all distinctions in biology is "potentiality" (p. 222), which is his own view, and a widely different one from that just explained. It is true that he quotes his author's exact words (with one omission) three pages further on; but not until the reader's mind has been thoroughly confused by the garbled version first given, and accompanied by some criticism showing an absolute misapprehension of their meaning—a misapprehension which a very slight study of the context would have obviated. In another quotation (p. 154), by the omission of some words, good grammar is turned into bad.

In reviewing Prof. Mivart On Truth I had to lament the very violent language used in speaking of the Darwinian theory. I regret to notice that he still accuses the chief supporters of that theory of teaching "the doctrine of the essential bestiality of man." I do not suppose that Prof. Mivart agrees with those who hold that civilisation has been developed out of barbarism; but I trust that even he would shrink from describing them as maintaining the essential barbarity of man. Yet the latter phrase is at least as justifiable as the former, and to refrain from using it would be showing good manners at the expense of good logic.

ALFRED W. BENN.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MĀDHAVA AND ŚĀYANA.

Elphinstone College, Bombay: Jan. 30, 1890.

The relation between Śāyana, author of the great commentary on the R̥gveda, and Mādhava, to whom the work is dedicated, and who is even apparently credited with the authorship in the introductory verses, has been matter of controversy. The late Dr. Burnell was the author of an ingenious theory, according to which Śāyana and Mādhava were only two names for one and the same person. I cannot now refer to Dr. Burnell's book (his edition of the Vaṁśabrāhmaṇa, 1873), but quote Prof. Weber, Indian Literature (p. 42, note). "Śāyana," Burnell says, "is the bhoganātha or mortal body of Mādhava the soul, identified with Viṣṇu." Prof. Max Müller (R̥gveda, vi, Preface, p. 25) refers to the theory, but does not pronounce any very decided opinion. He clings, however, to the view that Śāyana was the brother of Mādhava, the latter living retired from the world, the former being his literary representative.

I do not know if the controversy has proceeded further. But I have lately come upon a statement made by Mādhava himself which ought, I think, to settle it. Mādhava is the author of a commentary on the Parāśaramṛiti, which is extant. In the introduction to that work, as it stands in an old copy which I have recently bought for the Bombay Government, Mādhava gives the following account of his family—

"S'imatir janana yasya sukṛtir māyanaḥ pitā, Śāyano bhoganāthas'cha manobuddhi sahodaraḥ."

Prof. Max Müller has already noted (loc. cit.) that in the course of his commentary Śāyana describes himself as the son of Māyana and S'rimati (as Prof. Max Müller has the latter name). This confirms our verse, which in its turn puts it, I think, beyond all reasonable doubt that Māyana and S'rimati, or S'rimati, had three sons—Mādhava, Śāyana, and Bhoganātha. The two latter, Mādhava says, were his very "heart and soul." Mādhava in this Introduction describes himself in the usual way as chief minister of King Bukkana. I may, perhaps, add that Prof. Max Müller's statement that the author of the commentary refers to the author of the Nyāya-māla-vistara as "Bhāshyakāra," and the inference sought to be drawn, namely, that these two can hardly be the same, should be corrected. The Bhāshyakāra of the passage referred to is obviously not the author of the Nyāya-māla-vistara, but S'ankarāchārya.

SCIENCE NOTES.

SHORTLY before the recent discovery of coal in the boring of the South Eastern Railway at Shakespeare's Cliff, Mr. J. T. Day had been active in forming a committee to undertake similar explorations in the south-east of England. At a recent meeting of this committee, held at the London Chamber of Commerce, under Prof. Mc. K. Hughes, it was resolved that a thorough investigation of the deep-seated rocks in the south-eastern counties should be undertaken, with the view of tracing, if possible, the occurrence and distribution of the coal measures. As this investigation may have a significant bearing on the trade of the metropolis, it is hoped that the London Chamber of Commerce may be induced to co-operate in the work.

THE first number of the French journal L'Anthropologie, edited by MM. Cartailhac, Hamy, and Topinard, has been published. The principal papers are by Dr. Topinard—who describes the cranium of Charlotte Corday—and by M. Montelius, the Swedish archaeologist, who writes on the Bronze Age in Egypt. Abstracts of papers in other journals form a notable feature in the new review; and numerous English memoirs—not, however, so much anthropological as geological—are abstracted by M. Marcellin Boule. M. Cartailhac contributes a report of the proceedings of the International Congress of Anthropology, held last autumn in Paris.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MESSRS. BELL have in the press a revised and enlarged edition of the English translation of Teuffel's History of Roman Literature, which was published by them in 1873. The German work has now reached its fifth edition, with very large and valuable additions by the well-known scholar, Dr. L. Schwabe, to whom it was intrusted after Prof. Teuffel's death. Prof. Warr, of King's College, London, is the editor of the new English version, in which the old translation will be thoroughly revised, and all the additional matter from the latest German edition incorporated. The first volume will be published in September.

MR. E. R. WHARTON, of Jesus College, Oxford, has reprinted from the Proceedings of the Philological Society a paper on "Latin Consonant Laws," which was read before the society last December. Together with two former papers—on "Latin Vocalism" and "Loan-words in Latin"—it may be regarded as an anticipation of the elaborate work, entitled Etyma Latina, which the author has now in the press as a companion volume to Etyma Graeca. (Rivingtons.) In the present paper Mr. Wharton confines himself to points in the Latin consonant-system in which Brugmann's Grundriss may be supplemented by fresh ideas, or in which Brugmann has too hastily adopted the views of other philologists, or in which—and this is the one defect of Brugmann's system—he has paid too little attention to the influence of dialect. In this latter connexion, Mr. Wharton points out that no one of the classical Roman writers except Caesar was by birth a Roman. He proceeds to take the consonants in order, showing the changes to which they were liable. We must be content to quote the following as specimens of his results:

"igitur 'therefore' means properly 'it is added,' and stands for *jigitur from *jugitur, an 'aoristic' form of jungitur."

"mella for *melva from *medea seems to go with μέθυ 'wine' and Lithuanian medus 'honey.'"

"*dis (corresponding to dis) becomes in Festus duis, in ordinary Latin bis. The older form was dis, which remains in compounds to denote 'division'; and with it go de 'from' (denoting 'separation') and durus 'evil' ('different' from what it should be)."

"lanius 'butcher,' one who breaks up meat, from a root lam—'to break,' which appears in Old Slavonic lomiti 'to break,' English lame 'broken,' and the slang word lamm 'to beat' (Beaumont and Fletcher)."

"ed, an epigraphic form of et, appears in edepol as a condensed expression for 'e Oastor ed e Pol'; and in ideo 'therefore' for ed eo 'and by that.'"

DR. HUBERT WEIR SMYTH, of Bryn Mawr College, has sent us, as an extract from the Transactions of the American Philological Association (vol. xx.) a most elaborate paper on "The Vowel System of the Ionic Dialects." This paper, itself filling 136 pages, may be regarded as a prelude to the author's work on the Greek dialects generally, which the Clarendon Press has undertaken to publish. He here deals exhaustively with the several vowels and combinations of vowels, arranged under no less than 186 heads. On the evidence of inscriptions, he asserts the existence of three sub-dialects, which mark the course of Ionic emigration from the mainland of Greece: (1) Ionic of Euboea and colonies; (2) Ionic of the Kyklades; (3) Ionic of Asia Minor and of the adjacent islands and their colonies. Regarding this last, he is disposed to reject the well-known sub-division of Herodotos, as being probably based upon differences of vocabulary rather than upon the real test of phonology and schemes of inflection. The literary sources he classifies thus: (1) The elegiac and iambic poets; (2) Herodotos, Hippokrates, their contemporaries, immediate predecessors, and immediate successors; (3) the pseudo-Ionists of the Ionic renaissance. His general conclusions may be gathered from the following passages in his introduction:

"The language of the inscriptions alone is not an absolute criterion of the genuineness of an Ionic form unless the inscription is older than 400 B.C. and contains no trace of what is specifically Attic. When the language of the inscriptions, with this limitation, agrees with that of the poets, we have the surest criterion of the Ionic character of the form in question that is possible under the circumstances; and against this evidence the fluctuating orthography of Herodotean and Hippokratean MSS. can make no stand."

"My primary purpose has been to let the facts themselves show how great is the difference existing between what is certainly Ionic of the fifth century and what is ordinarily proclaimed as Ionic of the fifth century on the authority of Herodotean MSS. * * * My survey of the evidence has led me to the conclusion that the original text of Herodotos was written in the dialect of his time, while the bulk of the variations from that dialect is due to a μεταγραφησιμός, which I would place about the first century of our era."

"The cardinal error of the μεταγραφημένοι was the foisting of uncontracted forms upon Herodotos."

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY.—(Anniversary Meeting, Thursday, February 20.)

HYDE CLARKE, Esq., in the chair.—Lord Acton, Mr. Oscar Browning, Prof. Montagu Burrows, Prof. Mandell Creighton, Prof. Max Müller, and the Earl of Rosebery, were elected vice-presidents, and Messrs. H. Haines, H. Hall, J. S. Stuart Glennie, and Dr. Zeffi, members of the Council. Seventy Fellows were also elected.

FINE ART.

AN EARLY NETHERLANDISH PAINTER.

La Vie et l'Œuvre de Jean Bellegambe. Par Mgr. C. Dehaisnes. With Seven Heliotypes and One Lithograph. (Lille.)

THE sacristy of the church of Notre Dame at Douai contains an altar-piece of the early Netherlandish school of painting, remarkable not only for its size and the beauty of its composition, but also—so seldom the case—as being complete in all its parts. Its history is somewhat remarkable. Originally executed for the high altar of the Benedictine monastery of the Holy Saviour at Anchin, it remained there until 1790, when the abbey was suppressed, and this, with 157 other paintings, was removed to Douai, where the works of art from the religious houses in the neighbourhood were gathered together and stored. In the few years between that and 1801, whenever oak-boards were wanted by the municipal administration, recourse was had to this store. I remember on my first visit to Douai, nearly forty years ago, having seen shelves in the museum of natural history the under side of which still retained the remains of early paintings. On the restoration of divine worship in 1803, permission was granted to many of the newly appointed clergy to take a picture from the store to adorn their churches. The parish priest of Quincy, a native of the village in which the abbey of Anchin had stood, selected the three central panels of its old altar-piece. Later on, one of his successors gave these in part payment to a tradesman at Douai who had painted the walls and woodwork in the chancel of his church. By him they were employed as shutters to the window of his atelier, and there they were discovered by Dr. Escallier, who bought them of the widow for 40 francs. In 1805 the town authorities, wishing to make use of the building in which the remainder of the pictures were stored, sold them off by auction. The sale lasted three days; the six side panels of the altar-piece were sold with others for 7.50 francs to a M. Estabel. For the shutters of another picture no bidder could be found; and thus it happens that the wings of the altar-piece of the Immaculate Conception are now one of the chief objects of interest in the local museum. The six panels of the Anchin altar-piece were later on sold by Mr. Estabel for £80 to Dr. Escallier, who, in 1857, bequeathed the entire polyptych to his parish church, expressing in his will the wish that a chapel should be erected for its reception. The picture, however, has been kept, and is still in the sacristy where, when I first saw it in 1858, it bore a label certifying it to be the work of Hans Memlinc, Lancelot Blondeel, or Jean de Maubeuge. I then wrote a notice of it, and pointed out that this was the work of an unknown master, probably the author of two other pictures of which I also gave some account (Guide to Belgium, pp. 19-21). In April, 1862, M. Wauters discovered in a MS. in the Royal Library at Brussels the name of the author, John Bellegambe, mentioned by Guicciardini and Vasari as an excellent painter known to his contemporaries as le maître aux couleurs. His name is also found in local publications down to as late as 1653, when the Dominican Philip Petit, speaking of an altar-piece in the church of his convent, praises him as having been one of the best painters of his time.

Mgr. Dehaisnes, who in 1862 was keeper of the municipal archives of Douai, and had already published a volume on Art in Flanders, set seriously to transcribing all the documents he could find relating to artists and their works. Later on he was named archivist of the Département du Nord, when a much wider field of research was opened. In 1886 he published three volumes on Art in Flanders, Artois, and Hainault, down to the year 1400 (noticed in the ACADEMY, No. 797), in which he reprinted, together with a large number of inedited documents, all that had been already published, but carefully collated with the originals whenever these were accessible. This will remain a standard work which ought to be in every public library. The present volume is in every way worthy to stand beside it, and makes us look forward with impatience for his promised Documents on Art in the same districts in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the publication of which will, we trust, not be too long deferred. To return, however, to the subject of the present volume. John Bellegambe, born at Douai about 1476, was the son of a turner and chairmaker. Nothing has as yet been discovered as to his earlier years. In 1504, the date of the earliest document in which his name occurs, he was already married to the daughter of a corn-merchant. He seems to have been a well-to-do citizen, and to have constantly resided in Douai until his death in, or very shortly before, 1534. Two portraits of him are extant—one a sixteenth-century drawing in the Library at Arras; the other, painted by himself on the shutter of one of his triptychs, and here reproduced full size; though by no means handsome, his face is certainly very intelligent.

Mgr. Dehaisnes enumerates a number of works on which Bellegambe was engaged at Douai. Unfortunately, the accounts of the municipality and those of the collegiate church of Saint Amé are the only two series that have escaped destruction, and breaks occur even in these during the period of Bellegambe's activity. By the town council he was employed to paint on a sheet of lead, 6 feet high by 3½ feet wide, a figure of the Madonna, and on another, the arms of Charles V. These were fixed in the middle of the gable of one of the town gates. He also decorated the town clock, designed costumes, and painted a bird's-eye view of the country round Douai. He designed the orfres of vestments for the canons of Saint Amé, adorned their rood-screen with paintings and gilding—this included not only the decoration of the carved portions, but also figures of the evangelists and doctors of the Church, and of the saints whose relics were preserved in the sanctuary. He also painted an altar-piece for the chapel of St. Maurand. These and other works, executed for monastic houses, and for the cathedral of Cambrai, have, it is believed, all perished. Enough, however, has come down to our time to show that Bellegambe certainly deserves to rank as one of the best masters of the Netherlandish school of the first half of the sixteenth century. I have often, when admiring Gossaert's (Mabuse) lovely Epiphany picture at Castle Howard regretted that he ever visited Italy; one would have liked to study the natural development of his art. This one can do with Bellegambe, who, like his contemporary, John Prevost of Mons, remained true to the traditions of his school—the only foreigner of whose influence I have been able to find evidence in his work being Dürer.

The authentic works of Bellegambe comprise: (1) the polyptych of Anchin, consisting of nine panels; the interior representing the Most Holy Trinity in glory, with the Blessed Virgin, St. John Baptist, the Apostles, Martyrs, and whole court of heaven; the exterior, Christ the Redeemer adored by His Mother, and the abbot and monks of Saint Vedast. (2) A triptych in the Museum of Lille, a mystical picture representing the purification of the redeemed who are bathing in a font into which the Blood of the Lamb (Revelations vii. 14) is flowing from the five wounds of the Saviour hanging on the cross; towards this fount other souls are hastening, aided by Faith, Hope, and Charity. In the landscape background is seen a dungeon with armed men near it, evidently preparing to seize a despairing sinner who is wandering towards them, his back turned to the source of salvation. (3) The shutters of the triptych of the Immaculate Conception. (4) A triptych in the museum at Berlin, representing the Last Judgment with the special recompense and punishment awarded to the seven works of mercy and the capital sins. (5) A Madonna in the Brussels Museum. (6) and (7) Two triptychs painted for the Abbey of St. Vedast, now in the cathedral at Arras, the one completed in 1529, representing the Adoration of the Magi and Shepherds and other scenes connected with the infancy of Christ; the other, a Calvary picture—the preparations for the Crucifixion, the principal group of three figures representing Christ being stripped of his garments; on the shutters are figures of St. Anthony and St. Roch. The composition of the first of these is shown by an outline lithograph; all the others, with the exception of the inner side of the second, are admirably reproduced in heliotype by M. Dujardin, enabling the reader to form a very good idea of Bellegambe's talent as a composer. Other works of this master, in private hands, are noticed, two or three of which are said to be authentic; others, again, attributed to him with very little (if any) ground by Michiels and Scheibler, are mentioned.

Bellegambe's pictures are distinguished by a certain grace and elegance in the figures decidedly preferable to the affected mannerism apparent in Matsys' later pictures. His drawing is, as a rule, good, and the figures well modelled, but in some cases too tall. The pictures at Douai have suffered from neglect, unskilful cleaning, and restoration; the others, especially those in the museum at Lille and the cathedral of Arras, prove Bellegambe to have been a fine colourist. His landscape backgrounds are charming and his rendering of architectural details admirable. The effect of his earlier pictures is somewhat marred by the frequent introduction of tablets with inscriptions relative to the subjects represented—a plan apparently (judging by contemporary work, such as the votive pictures in the episcopal palace at Amiens and other paintings and miniatures) pretty generally followed by the artists of Picardy, Artois, and Hainault. These inscriptions generally consist of texts from Holy Scripture, but those on no. 3 include passages from the fathers and schoolmen. Mgr. Dehaisnes is, we think, mistaken in adducing these as proof of the theological knowledge of Bellegambe. That mediæval artists had a much more intimate acquaintance with Holy Scripture than their successors of the present day is undoubtedly true; but it is equally certain that, when a commission was given to an artist, it was the regular practice to stipulate that he should carry out in his work the details of the scheme drawn up by a theologian. Mgr. Dehaisnes has occasionally missed the meaning of minor groups in the landscape backgrounds, e.g., the Blessed Virgin and St. Joseph being told that there was no room for them in the inn at Bethlehem (p. 152). I feel also that I cannot close this notice without uttering a protest against the misspelling of Memlinc's name.

MR. ALFRED EAST'S PICTURES OF JAPAN.

SEVERAL artists have of late years paid a visit to Japan and brought back their portfolios full of sketches of that charming country and its fascinating people. Mr. F. Dillon was, we think, the first, and many will still remember his bright and delicate drawings; and, later, we have had Mr. Menpes and Mr. Wores—the former dainty and brilliant, but more occupied with the picturesque side of Japanese street-life than intent to show us what Japan is really like; the latter wholly a recorder and not wholly an artist. In Mr. East's drawings we get something between the two. We learn more of the general aspect of Japan as it would appear to an European traveller than we learnt from Mr. Menpes, and his records are always those of a well-trained artist with a cachet of his own. On the whole, we are inclined to think that his is at once the most faithful and the most beautiful illustration of Japan that has yet been painted by an Englishman, and also the fullest; for Mr. East does not only show us what the streets of the principal cities are like, but he takes us to the open country, gives us harbours and lakes as well as tea-houses, and cryptomerias as well as cherry blossoms. He enables us to realise many things we have never seen before except through Japanese spectacles. None that we can name has painted for us the marvellous mountain of Fiji with whose imposing outline, much idealised, we are all so familiar in the drawings of Hokusai and almost every other Japanese artist. Now we see it as it is, not only rising in naked grandeur, but mysterious in gloom, or half-shrouded in mists, subject to all kinds of atmospheric change—changing in shape also, as seen from different sides and different altitudes. No one, either, has before dared to paint in their full force of colour the red-lacquered temples, shining like sealing-wax in the rays of the dying sun. In a word, we can take long country walks in Japan now under the guidance of Mr. Alfred East.

It is to the studies, often slight, but never without charm of colour and design, that we turn with the most pleasure. The larger pictures which have been painted in England bear, it seems to us, signs of haste in execution, and appear less complete than the sketches. There is also, as a matter of course, some inequality throughout. Some, like the "Lotus Pond at Kamakura" (42), which, in spite of evident care to render faithfully the gigantic flowers, misses complete success; a few in which the colour strikes rather crudely; but with the majority little fault can be found, and not a few are of singular beauty. Among the last class may be safely reckoned "Kobe Harbour" (4), "Return from Viewing the Cherry-blossoms at Shiba" (8), "Lake Biwa" (9), "Moist Heat—another View of the Lake" (14), "Tea-house near Kiyôto" (29), "Fuji-San from the Plains of Suzu-gawa" (32), "View of Miga-no-shita" (35), "Fishermen on Lake Biwa" (37), "Tea-house in the Village of Hakone" (43), "Miss Plum Blossom" (47), "The Red Temple of Gion" (50), "Steps leading up to Maku-yama" (66), "Fuji-san in Rising Mist" (68), "Evening Gloom in a Cryptomeria Forest" (73), "A Roseate Flush on Fuji" (81), "The Sammon of Shiba" (89), "Gay and Grave" (93). This list is not meant to be in any way exhaustive, as any visitor will soon find out, nor is it made at random; for, if these pictures were shown alone, they would reveal a very skilful and delicate artist, and give some idea at least of Mr. East's rank as a landscape artist, and, we may add, as a poet too.

A FORGED ROMAN TILE.

Lancing College: Feb. 19, 1890.

In the Ephemeris Epigraphica (iv., n. 698, p. 207), Dr. Hübnér, following Mr. W. T. Watkin (Archæological Journal, xxxiii, 1876, 356), publishes a tile supposed to have been found in Cannon Street, and inscribed D-N-VOC. Watkin explained this as decurio numeri Vocontiorum; and his explanation has been discussed by Mommsen, who rejects it (Hermes, xix., 45 n), and by Hirschfeld, who accepts it (Sitzungsberichte der Wiener Akademie, ciii. i., 294; C.I.L. xii., p. 150).

After all, the tile turns out to be a forgery, as Mr. A. W. Franks has assured me in answer to an inquiry. Possibly the thing may belong to the same class as two forged tiles in the Guildhall Museum, inscribed VNDINIO and FVIONV, the former of which, I suppose, is a bad shot at Londinium.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

A GENERAL meeting of the Society for the Preservation of Ancient Monuments in Egypt (of which Mr. Edward J. Poynter is hon. secretary) will be held on Friday next, March 14, to protest against the recent wanton destruction of monuments on the Nile, of which details were given by Col. Ross and Prof. Sayce in the ACADEMY of February 8 and March 1.

THE exhibitions to open next week include that of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water-colours, in Piccadilly; and a collection of water-colour drawings by Mr. F. G. Colman, done at Winchester, Christ Church, Romney, Bosham, etc., at Mr. Dunthorne's in Vigo Street.

WE hear that Mr. William Strang will have, at Mr. Dunthorne's, sometime during next month, an exhibition of the whole of his etched or engraved work.

ON Tuesday Mr. James Orrock will read a paper before the Society of Arts, on a subject which he has made his own—the inclusion within the National Gallery of a much greater number of works by the British masters. Sir James Linton will be in the chair; and some pictures by illustrious English masters, who are not represented in the National Gallery, will be exhibited by Mr. Orrock.

A MINIATURE portrait of the late Dr. Warren de la Rue has been presented by his son to the Royal Institution, with which Dr. de la Rue was so long associated.

A PORTRAIT of Sir Anthony Musgrave (late Governor of Queensland, and formerly Governor of Jamaica) by the Hon. John Collier is on view at the Royal Colonial Institution. It will shortly be sent to the Jamaica Institute, for which it has been painted.

WE quote the following from the Oxford Magazine:

"The efforts of the excavators at Salamis [in Cyprus] have been rewarded at last by the discovery of an early temple under the sand-hills which cover the seaward side of the city. Dr. Dörpfeld, of Olympia fame, saw the works a fortnight ago, and expressed confident anticipations of a considerable find. Already some small objects of art have been discovered, besides several inscriptions; and the site of a great civic building has been found, but not yet thoroughly explored. The sand drifted rapidly and deeply over the city of Teucer, and hid it from the spoiler; but it will take much labour and money to clear away the thick sliding covering. Nothing is so difficult to dig in as fine sand. Already the explorers have found evidence of the successive restorations of the city, after its destruction by the Jews in Trajan's time, and by an earthquake in that of Constantine. And there is every reason to hope that, imbedded in later buildings or buried beneath them, they may find many relics of the times when Salamis gave a grudging tribute to Persia, or under Evagoras was filled by the artists and authors of Hellas."

THE STAGE.

"A PAIR OF SPECTACLES" AT THE GARRICK.

To the ill-advised horrors of "The Tosca" genial comedy has succeeded. Mr. Sydney Grundy has furnished a finished actor and a most artistic manager with a comedy as healthy as it is entertaining. One now goes to the Garrick with satisfaction.

"A Pair of Spectacles" is, indeed, rather a poor and trifling name for a piece which exhibits more than the average dramatist's power in observing human nature, and which—albeit with some farcical touches—does contain significant portraits of character. The piece is as devoid of love interest as are "Le Cousin Pons" and "L'Interdiction." Even as the dutiful wife the young woman of the story plays but a very small part. Of intrigue there is absolutely nothing; nothing whatever of elaborate plot. Yet during the two hours' traffic of the stage there are not ten minutes in which the spectator has the opportunity to be bored; and there are but a few moments—they are in the second act—in which comedy is felt to have given place to the purely farcical: in which the proceedings behind the footlights bear no longer any relation to life, and so the interest of them has vanished. A piece of which these circumstances may with accuracy be recorded must clearly have in it some very considerable qualities. And whatever the French original may possess—I do not profess to have read it—Mr. Grundy's present adaptation has a brisk and vivid presentment of character, and a dialogue, which, without being quotable in separate sentences for its brilliance, has the charm and the value of the apropos. The talk could not be more spontaneous; could not be neater; could not be more suited to the incidents with which it deals.

Mr. Benjamin Goldfinch and Mr. Gregory Goldfinch are two brothers: men of middle-class blood, both of them prosperous—to a certain extent wealthy—but of absolutely different social world. Benjamin Goldfinch, played by Mr. Hare, is a charming and benevolent gentleman, living in London in one of the three suburbs which are accounted "possible," and absolutely happy with an attractive second wife, and with a grown-up son who reminds him agreeably of the first. To him there enters, as the stage directions used to say, his brother Gregory—in whom Mr. Grundy has the amazing courage to show us a rough North-countryman who is not honest just because he is disagreeable, nor golden-hearted because he does not know how to behave. Gregory, in truth, is a curmudgeon, whose virtues require cultivation as much as his manners. Gregory believes in nobody. And the interest of the play depends, to a great extent, upon the influence which—certain ingeniously contrived circumstances always aiding him—he comes to exercise upon the charming brother Benjamin, whom, gradually, he renders suspicious, and, for the nonce, ungracious, putting two and two together to the impugning of everyone's motives and of everyone's conduct. Benjamin, though delightful, is without keenness of vision; and the "spectacles" of Gregory—which he thought would assist him—do him little service. He ends by discarding them. And by this time things are so contrived that some traces of humanity have shown themselves in the brother from the North. Gregory behaves better than formerly to a son who has hitherto owed everything to Benjamin. The curtain falls on a restored serenity. That is the bare outline of events—one can hardly indicate the smartness with which incident follows incident. The crispness of the conduct of the piece is wholly admirable.

The acting, too, is of excellent smoothness and finish. Mr. Hare is seen with a prominence which, be it said to his credit, he has made unusual at his own theatre. He is welcomed in a part which, while it is the leading one, is suited to him from beginning to end: more than that, I doubt if we have any actor on the stage who could play it with quite his naturalness and charm. His performance is incisive, of course; but it is likewise forcible, and, in the minuteness of its detail, it does not lose either breadth or warmth. Mr. Charles Groves is exceedingly effective in the simpler, but still telling, part of Uncle Gregory; and a pleasant bit of character-drawing is given us by Mr. Dodsworth as one Lorimer, a friend of Benjamin's. Two young men—the sons of the two brothers—are played by Mr. Rudge Harding and Mr. Sydney Brough. The latter has, perhaps, the better part—an engaging semi-scapegrace—and there is sunshine and charm in his performance. But Mr. Rudge Harding deserves, I think, equal praise for the directness and frankness which he indicates to us in the character of Benjamin's offspring. The quite minor men's parts are played with neatness by Mr. Knight and Mr. Cathcart; and of the women—comparatively in the background—it may at least be said that Miss Horlock, though a little wanting in naïveté and in brightness, is not at all inefficient, and that Miss Kate Rorke gives what is recognised as the charm of her personality to a character that asks from her a good deal less than her skill could, at need, bestow.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

THE "AJAX" OF SOPHOCLES AT ST. ANDREWS.

THE University Shakspearean and Dramatic Society celebrated the tenth year of its existence by giving three performances of the "Aias" of Sophocles on February 20, 21, and 22. Some scholars may be disappointed to learn that the play was not produced in the original Greek, as might have been expected in an academic performance. But Greek scholars in St. Andrews, though select, are few; and the townsfolk who form the playgoing audience here, for the most part, understand only the more familiar tongue. So "to do a great good" we did a "little ill," sacrificing Greek for English—we had almost said Sophocles for Shakspeare. For the society was particularly fortunate in being able to use the noble translation by Prof. Lewis Campbell, with its fine blank-verse dialogue, steeped in the mind and art of Shakspeare, and its exquisitely-rhymed choric songs. It proved a vehicle worthy to bear the thoughts of the best. The debt which the society owes to our worthy Greek professor—who has presided over its destinies from the first—was further increased by the pains which he took to make the representation of his favourite author's play as effective as possible; and to him and to his accomplished wife the success of the piece was mainly due.

Following the practice generally adopted in recent years of assigning the female parts to women, the society secured the services of Mrs. Lewis Campbell for the part of Athena, and of Miss Helen Campbell for that of Tecmessa. To these two ladies and to one or two kind friends—among whom were Mrs. Fleeming Jenkin (well known for her interest in the ancient drama) and Mrs. Spencer Baynes—chiefly belonged the credit of mounting the play and of accurately and harmoniously designing the costumes.

Mr. James Ferguson played the leading rôle with great truth and force. Though, perhaps, hardly tall enough for the Telamonian chief, Mr. Ferguson in his impersonation lost little through this defect, as every figure showed tall on the narrow stage with its simple background of dark green; and the "high-sceptred pair" of Argos, whose commanding stature might otherwise have dwarfed the hero, did not enter until Aias was dead. Especially good was his declamation of the noble lines:

"But unto thee, fresh beam of shining day
And thee, thou travelling Sun-god, I may speak
Now, and no more for ever. O, fair light!
O, sacred fields of Salamis, my home!
Thou, firm-set natal hearth: Athens renowned,
And ye her people whom I love; O rivers,
Brooks, fountains here—yea, even the Trojan plain
I now invoke! Kind fosterers, farewell!
This one last word from Aias peals to you:
Henceforth my speech will be with souls unseen."

The eloquent hush amid which these last pathetic words were spoken showed how surely the actor had touched the springs of pity and terror; and as the "self-slain slayer" fell upon the fatal sword, one could see from the applause which followed how fully the audience appreciated the dramatic intensity with which he had invested the scene.

Miss Helen Campbell, as the "hero's captive bride," won the hearts of all by her graceful and refined acting, free from all staginess; and her noble Greek-like simplicity and self-control gave a peculiar charm to a delineation which was almost perfect. There was no overstepping of the limits to the expression of emotion—as in some of the plays given during the recent revival of the ancient drama at Oxford and Cambridge, notably in the “Alcestis” at the former, and (as most critics thought) in the “Ajax” at the latter, university. Here Tecmessa, Phrygian though she was, spoke and acted in the true Greek spirit:

ἐκβαλοῦσα καρδίαν τὸ βάρβαρον.

Mrs. Campbell, as Athena, was grave, majestic, admirable; and, standing on her pedestal, and in her white, flowing robe, she looked divinely tall. “Patuit dea.” Speaking her words in tones weighty and yet serene, this “daughter of the highest” left upon us an impression that will not be lightly effaced.

Of the other actors, Mr. James Scott showed most dramatic talent. His rendering of the part of Teucer was evidently the outcome of most careful study. What we found most to praise in him was his uniform gracefulness of movement and gesture, and his tenderly sympathetic manner towards the dead hero's child, Euryclides. The scene in which Euryclides is brought on the stage to help in tending the dead body of his father stirred the sympathies of all, so tender, touching, and lifelike was the picture of the widowed mother caressed by her infant child as she bent over the form of her dear dead lord. No passionate outburst of lyric song, not the most imaginative of epic lines, could have touched us like this picture. We felt that we should have lost much had we missed it; and the force of the remark was brought home to us that the great masterpieces, even of ancient tragedy, must “be acted ere they may be scanned.”

The performance of the Chorus, judged by the effect on the audience, was the least successful part of the whole play. Only their exits and entrances may be said to have been thoroughly effective. The declamation of choric songs is undeniably difficult; and, as all the lyrical passages—with the exception of the short joyous song of invocation to Pan and Apollo—were given without musical accompaniment, the method of merely rhythmical recitative which was employed was scarcely satisfactory. To the inherent difficulty of this method we may attribute the want which we felt in the Chorus of that naturalness and spontaneity which so pleasantly characterised the speeches of the other players, and saved them from being heavy. But, in spite of a certain monotony in their rendering of the songs, and a tendency now and again to unduly heighten or lower their voices when taking part in the dialogue, the Chorus deserve an emphatic word of praise for the prompt and thorough way in which their “business” was gone through.

STAGE NOTES.

MRS. LANGTRY'S revival of “As You Like It,” at the St. James's, meets with a fair measure of success. It is generally, we think, considered satisfactory as a spectacle, and Mrs. Langtry's Rosalind is a performance of great intelligence, and of some distinction. As an artist, Mrs. Langtry has greatly ripened and developed since she was last seen in England, and, as a woman, time has dealt gently with her. Mr. Lawrence Cantley, an actor of merit, is asserted to have been, on the first night of the revival, far from what is called “word-perfect.” This defect—the very first of all to be remedied—has now, we suppose, received attention. No conception of a part can be accurately formed—still less can it even begin to be carried out—until an actor is absolutely master of the lines it is his business to deliver. Mr. Charles Sugden, though he has been seldom seen in Shaksperian characters, is not unwelcome in the part he plays at the St. James's. Miss Beatrice Lamb is an interesting Phoebe. Audrey is played—and perhaps even better than it was played some years ago—by Miss Marion Lea, the quaint and finished humour of whose performance has been widely recognised.

THE Shakspeare Reading Society's public reading of “Much Ado About Nothing,” at the London Institution, was, we think, distinctly in advance of their “Twelfth Night”; and if it was not more immediately telling, that is because a gentler and less obvious comedy—and at the same time a serious interest less profound—characterises, for the most part, the piece whose interpretation has been now successfully essayed. Without criticising the reading in any great detail, it is scarcely too much to say that not one part was badly done, and that in several parts there was displayed a conspicuous and admirable merit. Of course the Dogberry of Mr. Samuel Johnson—who appeared by Mr. Irving's permission—was a highly popular performance. It was also a skilled one. Mr. Whelan, as Don John, gave evidence of the director's admirable training; and it is not everybody who can so profit by instruction. Mr. Frank Murray, who was Toby last year, read the character of Borachio, and delivered his long speeches with effective rapidity and ease. Mr. Buckley and Mr. Hermann Basing gave a good account of themselves as Claudio and Benedick, and Mr. George Blagrove as Antonio, and Colonel Everitt discharged himself of the part of Leonato with singular and admirable pathos. If Miss Alexis Leighton—a professional actress of some mark—had not quite the abounding humour of Beatrice, she was in no wise deficient when the situation became serious. Miss Gertrude Giles was an extremely pleasant Hero. To sum up, we do not know what other group of people in London could have read the piece so well as did this one which Mr. Poel directs.

MESSRS. WILLARD AND LART, being under contract to produce, during their tenancy of the Shaftesbury Theatre, a play by Mr. Arthur Law, are compelled to curtail the London run of “The Middleman,” of which, therefore, only a limited number of additional representations can be given.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

LAST Friday week the Wind Instrument Chamber Music Society held the first concert of their second season at the Royal Academy, Tenterden Street. This society is doing much good in producing works seldom, if ever, heard in London; in offering prizes for compositions; and in giving to unknown performers of promise opportunities of being heard. Besides the public concerts, meetings are held at which new or unfamiliar works are tried. The programme on February 28 included Beethoven's Sextet, an early work though marked op. 71, Spohr's Septet (op. 147), and an Octet by Lachner. The recent death of the last-named composer gave special interest to his music. In this Octet Lachner shows a mastery of form, and blends the various instruments together with consummate tact and taste. The performances were all good.

Mdme. Backer Grøndahl made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace last Saturday afternoon, and played Grieg's pianoforte Concerto in A minor (op. 16). This able and sympathetic interpreter of the Scandinavian composer's music came to London last season, and was heard in the same work. It will, therefore, be sufficient to say that on Saturday she more than confirmed the favourable impression already made. Her command of the keyboard is immense; but to this she adds the higher poetical and intellectual gifts which constitute a pianist of the first rank. The programme included Dvorák's tender and plaintive Notturmo for string orchestra (op. 40). A. B. in the programme-book speaks of this composer's name having been made familiar to the patrons of the Saturday Concerts by his Slavonic Dances, “a” Symphony, an Overture (“Mein Heim”), and a pianoforte Concerto. Probably time failed him to tell of other important works—of a second Symphony, of the “Spectre's Bride,” and of “St. Ludmilla.” Beethoven's Symphony in D was splendidly performed. Mr. Braxton Smith sang in an artistic manner “Love in Her Eyes” from “Acis and Galatea.”

M. de Pachmann, previous to his departure for America, gave a farewell concert at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon, and the entire programme was devoted to Chopin. M. de Pachmann is the most satisfactory interpreter of this music, and while listening to him one experiences no feeling of monotony. The pianist on mounting the platform tried by gesture to let the audience know that his hands were cold. The opening bars of the Sonata in B flat minor were not perfectly clear; but soon the player warmed to his work, and surpassed himself. During the performance of the Funeral March one could have heard a pin drop, so rapt were the listeners. This was followed by the Ballade in A flat and the Allegro de Concert (op. 46), two marvellously fine readings. Afterwards M. de Pachmann played a variety of short solos, by no means confining himself to the order of the programme. The D flat Valse was given with numerous arabesques, somewhat after the style of Tausig's treatment of Weber's “Invitation.” If M. de Pachmann has any authority for these additions, it ought to have been stated. If not, as is more probable, he should refrain from them. So great an artist should set a better example. Not only in the Valse, but in one or two of the other pieces, there were readings not according to the text. There was a large and appreciative audience.

Mme. de Pachmann appeared in the evening at the Popular Concert, and gave Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses (op. 54) with refinement and expression; but one would have liked more colour and breadth. Dr. Joachim played a Spohr Adagio. Mr. Hirwen Jones was successful as the vocalist. He sang Piatti's new song “My little maid and I,” with ‘cello obbligato by the composer. The concert opened with Brahms' Sextet in G, and closed with Beethoven's Trio in C minor for strings.

Mme. Backer-Grøndahl gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Steinway Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The programme commenced with Mozart's Fantasia in C minor, the one belonging to the Sonata in the same key, with an original part for second piano composed by Grieg. It is with regret that we find so eminent a musician showing such want of reverence towards one of the great masters. This useless transcription, with its inartistic mixture of styles, casts a blot on Grieg's musical scutcheon. Tausig—famous, or rather infamous, for his tamperings—never did anything worse. The duet was performed by the concert giver and Mme. Haas, and was, we are glad to say, coldly received. Mme. Grøndahl played in her best style a group of short solos, including a very characteristic piece by Ole Olsen, entitled “Fanitull,” which might be easily taken as Grieg's, and three of this composer's most delightful tone-poems. The “An den Frühling” was interpreted with great feeling and charm. After Grieg came Chopin, who was represented by his Nocturne in G minor and his A flat Ballade. The lady's reading of both pieces displayed marked individuality. The hall was so crowded that some of the audience had seats placed for them on the platform. Mme. Gröndahl could fill a larger place.

"The Cotter's Saturday Night," set to music for chorus and orchestra, by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie, was given for the first time in London by the Albert Hall Society last Saturday evening. In undertaking to set this poem of wide-world fame to music, the composer assumed a heavy responsibility. There was on the one hand the danger of making the music too important, and on the other that of making it appear superfluous. Dr. Mackenzie has found the happy mean. To say that Burns's lines have been strengthened or improved would not be true; but the composer has graphically illustrated the work, and added to its attractiveness, just as pictures drawn by a clever artist are welcome in some well-known book. Dr. Mackenzie for the most part keeps in the background. He suggests, colours, decorates. We seem to see and hear the social gathering and friendly talk in the cottage. The scene of the family circle before, at, and after supper, the reading from the "big ha' Bible," the singing and the praying, is accompanied by tones of great freshness, picturesqueness, and transparency. The delicate touches of realism, the sparing yet effective use of representative themes, the appropriate manner in which the various elements belonging to the Scottish national music are introduced—all these things display skill and judgment. Here and there the musician assumes a prominent position. The lines, "O happy love," present a suitable moment; so also do the closing ones, "From scenes like these," &c. The form in which the music is cast is an advantageous one. It continues from beginning to end without break, and the various scenes are cleverly welded together. Dr. Mackenzie has not set the entire poem; the portions omitted, however, do not in any way interfere with the general design. We consider this "Cotter's Saturday Night" one of Dr. Mackenzie's most characteristic and genial productions. The performance, under the direction of the composer, was good and the work was well received. We may mention that this was originally produced at the Edinburgh Choral Union, on December 16, 1889. The second part of the programme was devoted to Dr. Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal." We have already noticed this work on the occasion of its production, and have therefore only to say that it was well rendered. The beautiful duet between Miss Macintyre and Mr. Barton McGuckin was specially well received. Miss Hannah Jones and Mr. J. M. Gibson took part in the quartet. Mr. J. Bennett's poem was recited in an intelligent and expressive manner by Miss Julia Neilson, of the Haymarket Theatre. At the close Dr. Mackenzie received an ovation.

Two Shillings and Sixpence, post free.

Boyhood, Adolescence, and Youth.

By LEON TOLSTOI,

Author of "Anna Karenina," "What I Believe," "War and Peace," &c., &c.

Translated by CONSTANTINE POPOFF.

"Extremely interesting. Tolstol's power of description is admirably shown in the pictures of Russian scenery. Some of the incidental characters bear the impress of real portraiture."—Times Weekly.

"Singularly eloquent and deeply interesting. The translation is exceedingly well done, the English being clear, vigorous, and forcible."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"An English reader could not read the story in a better rendering."—The Scotsman.

"Supplying an unquestionably graphic picture of the Russian of the time."—Globe.

"Mr. Stock's publication derives its chief merit from its translation by a native of Russia. Mr. Popoff's English is remarkably good; so good, indeed, that it is only here and there, by dint of hard searching, that we can find anything betraying the handling of a foreigner."—Booksteller.

"Delightful and characteristic specimens of Tolstol's writing."—Manchester Guardian.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price
Three Shillings and Sixpence, post free.

The Poets and Peoples of Foreign Lands.

By J. W. CROMBIE.

"A genuine and substantial contribution to the belles lettres; it really is calculated to add to the general knowledge and appreciation of literary work. Mr. Crombie supplies not only criticism, but biographical data and translations of the poems quoted; and, while his verse is neat and accurate, his prose is flowing and pleasant. His book is altogether very readable and informing, and is calculated to instruct as well as delight."—Globe.

"A very pleasant little book, in which unhackneyed and interesting subjects are discussed by a sound scholar and intelligent critic, without a touch of pretence or affection. Mr. Crombie is never dull: he can tell a story simply and effectively, and the quotations which light up his pages (each given in the original as well as in English) are very happily chosen."—Scots' Observer.

"He takes his readers to what will be fresh woods and pastures new to most of them. There is a strange beauty in many of the songs and ballads. He succeeds in making his matter thoroughly interesting."—Full Mail Gazette.

"The cultivated reader of Mr. Crombie's pages, especially if he be a lover of the by-ways of literature, will have nothing but gratitude for a writer who has a great deal to say that is altogether new, and who says it in a very pleasant and winning way."—Manchester Examiner.

"In a high degree fresh and interesting. His criticisms are indicative of clear insight and a broad sympathy. But in nothing, perhaps, are his literary taste and linguistic skill better exhibited than in the various translations he has given."—Aberdeen Free Press.

"Mr. J. W. Crombie has done well to bring together and publish his essays on 'The Poets and Peoples of Foreign Lands.' They form a series of studies of foreign literature varied as the speech and genius of the poets with which they treat. . . . The writer is a sympathetic guide in the lowly and homely, yet strangely beautiful, paths of folk poetry through which he leads us."—Scotsman.

"The best proof of his success is afforded by the fact that the only regret of every reader will be that his volume is so brief. . . . To Scotsmen, his sketch of the life and work of Klaus Grotto will be especially attractive. . . . It is easy to estimate his skill and facility as a translator. The ease and fluency with which his versions are cast prove his possession of a rare poetic instinct, and suggest that he might readily win a name in this department of literature."—Dundee Advertiser.

LITERATURE.

"GREAT WRITERS"—Life of George Eliot. By Oscar Browning. (Walter Scott.)

THIS volume, though not the largest, is, in many ways, the most interesting and satisfactory biography of George Eliot which has yet appeared; and it would be quite unfair to Mr. Oscar Browning to attribute these excellences merely to the fact that it is the latest comer in the field. True, he is largely indebted, as it was inevitable he should be, to Mr. Cross's Life and Letters of George Eliot, and in his prefatory note he frankly acknowledges his indebtedness; but he has added to the material thus derived much information previously scattered or inedited, and has, moreover, been able to supplement these results of research and reading by a record of reminiscences and impressions accumulated through fifteen years of increasingly intimate personal friendship.

On the third page of his book Mr. Oscar Browning warns the reader that he must not expect to find the relation of any "new facts" in the life of George Eliot; and, so far as any large or specially important facts are concerned, the warning is justified by the pages which follow. For example, Mr. Cross displayed a quite natural and understandable reticence in telling the story of the origin of George Eliot's union with Mr. G. H. Lewes. He gave a few extracts from George Eliot's letters containing passing references to Lewes as a most ordinary acquaintance or friend; and then, with no further preparation than this, announced that she had taken the momentous step which was, in a hundred ways, to be so much to her. Many of those who open Mr. Oscar Browning's work for the first time will run lightly over its early pages to reach those devoted to this crisis in George Eliot's life with the expectation that the author will, in spite of his warning, lift—at any rate partially—the veil of mystery. This expectation is unfulfilled. Mr. Oscar Browning is as reticent as his predecessor, but, unlike his predecessor, he buttresses his reticence with a reason; for, writing of George Eliot and Lewes he says: "It is needless to gratify a morbid curiosity as to the origin or development of the relation between them." It is impossible to avoid asking the question, "Why morbid curiosity?" On the preceding page Mr. Oscar Browning has spoken of the union as "a true marriage"; and why should there be anything not thoroughly natural and wholesome in the desire to know something of the stages by which two most interesting personalities—a man of exceptional talent and a woman of supreme genius—drew near to each other, passed from indifference to regard, from regard to love, to find themselves at last joined for life in the closest of all unions? When the life of the great poet whom we have so lately lost comes to be written, his biographer will surely not refrain from telling, with such delicacy of sympathy as may be given him, something of that lovely story of the courtship of two poets which one of them has already half-told in the "Sonnets from the Portuguese." If, as may be the case, the fact is that of this other courtship nothing is really known that is not to be found in George Eliot's published letters, it would be better to say so frankly than to invent an excuse for an inevitable silence which is no excuse at all.

Still, though Mr. Oscar Browning has no large new facts to communicate, he has added to previous records a number of small facts which, while they may seem trivial, are not really insignificant. There is, for example, an odd illustration of one very noteworthy feature of her character—her singular susceptibility to the influence of stronger or more persistent personalities—in the story how, when she first came under the spell of the philosophical and phrenological Mr. Bray, she actually consented to have her head shaved in order that a cast might be taken of it by or for that worthy enthusiast for "bumps." Indeed, the Bray family completely subjugated her; and she was aware of the subjection—aware that the impulses forcing her along new, untried, and painful paths were impulses from without, not from within. Much has been said about the celerity and ease with which George Eliot abandoned the Evangelical Christianity of her early years, but her critics in this respect have surely judged a little too hastily. It is abundantly clear that some portions of her task of translating Strauss's Leben Jesu, which had been pressed upon her rather than spontaneously undertaken, were inexpressibly and almost unbearably painful to her. Mr. Oscar Browning quotes from Mr. Cross's pages the letter in which Mrs. Bray, writing to Miss Sara Hennell, reports that Miss Evans describes herself as "Strauss-sick—it makes her ill dissecting the beautiful story of the Crucifixion, and only the sight of 'the Christ image and picture' [a biscuit ware copy of Thorwaldsen's lovely conception] makes her endure it."

She did endure it, however, sustained not merely by the silent image, but by devotion to her task-masters; for, as she significantly said in later years, "It is not true that love makes all things easy; it makes us choose what is difficult."

The ascendancy of the Brays and the Hennells was followed by the ascendancy of Lewes; and though his influence in the main ran along rather than across the true current of her nature, and was therefore submitted to without even such temporary revolt as that just recorded, there is reason to believe that it occasionally diverted her from the path which her genius would instinctively have chosen. Most careful readers and sensible people will agree with Mr. Oscar Browning that to attribute to the influence of Lewes what has been called the "scientific depravation" of her later style is altogether unfair. There was, in fact, no such "depravation" at all. As Mr. Oscar Browning points out, "her very first published essay begins with a scientific metaphor"; and he might have added that a handful of such metaphors and allusions may be gathered from the pages of her earliest work in fiction—the Scenes of Clerical Life—against the style of which no critic has dared to bring a railing accusation. Still, it may be doubted whether the influence of Lewes was at all times an influence "making for [artistic] righteousness." For example, to quote from Mr. Oscar Browning,

"Mr. W. Call, a very competent critic, tells us in the Westminster Review that the violent conflict of Adam with Arthur is an offence to art, and that the commonplace marriage of Adam with Dinah is a disappointing close to the career of the sweet Methodist saint. He also maintains that the reprieval episode is an artificial and mechanical contrivance. It would have been better if George Eliot had followed more closely the fate of the girl Voce who was condemned to death at the Nottingham Assizes and executed. At a later period she would have done this. Yet, as we have seen, these very features were inserted at the suggestion of Lewes, and would have been absent if George Eliot had maintained more confidence in her own insight and discrimination."

This confidence, however, could not well be maintained, for the simple reason that it hardly seems to have been even occasionally felt. When her earliest long novel was on the first flood-tide of success, she wrote to Major Blackwood:

"I am assured that Adam Bede was worth writing—worth living through long years to write. But now it seems impossible to me that I shall ever write anything so good and true again. I have arrived at faith in the past, but not at faith in the future."

At the time these words were written from Wadsworth, the incomparable early chapters of The Mill on the Floss were probably in MS. A few months afterwards comes another wail:

"I have been invalided for the last week, and, of course, am a prisoner in the castle of Giant Despair, who growls in my ear that The Mill on the Floss is detestable, and that the last volume will be the climax of that general detestableness. Such is the elation attendant upon what a self-elected lady correspondent from Scotland calls my 'exciting career.'"

I have dwelt at what may seem disproportionate length upon George Eliot's singular dependence upon voices from without—because in Mr. Oscar Browning's Life this feature of her character is exhibited much more prominently than in previous biographies. We have heard repeatedly, principally from those who have set themselves to explain or defend George Eliot's second union, that hers was a nature which absolutely demanded the constant support of another nature more self-reliant and self-sufficing, "a face to look upon, a heart that beats, a hand to touch." But to be simply told this is one thing, to be made to realise it is another; and Mr. Oscar Browning not merely does the telling, but achieves the realisation. All the perplexing problems of George Eliot's life are not solved yet; but this little book brings us nearer to a solution than we have ever been brought before.

The curious thing was that there flowed out constantly from her personality, her presence, and her utterances, the very strength and stimulation for others which she needed so much for herself. No one was ever more successful than was this weak, self-distrustful woman in the conscious or unconscious administration of the moral tonic which enabled those who came within the sphere of her influence to quit themselves like men, and to be strong. Mr. Oscar Browning quotes from a beautiful letter received from her at a crisis in his life which had just this bracing and invigorating effect; and he was only one of a hundred beneficiaries. From those Sunday afternoon receptions of which he gives so charming a description, men and women went away with thoughts which, had they been expressed at all, would have found utterance in the words, "It has been good to be here."

In isolated details of interest Mr. Oscar Browning's book is very rich, so rich that he has little to fear from those reviewers—terrible persons they must be to some writers—who sample a book by extracting from it everything which makes it specially worth reading. He certainly makes an addition to the number of apparently insoluble George Eliot problems when he tells us that, in the course of his fifteen years' friendship with the creator of Mrs. Poyser, Bartle Massey, the Dodson sisters, and Solomon Macey, he never remembers having heard her say a humorous thing; nor, he adds, "have I ever heard a humorous saying of hers repeated by those who knew her better than I did." Her letters are not less empty of this element which makes its presence so powerfully felt in her purely creative work; and the fact is one of which those who hold the traditional theory of genius as a kind of inspiration—and spurn the definition of Mr. Grant Allen, to whom it is but an exceptional development of talent—will not fail to note and remember.

Mr. Oscar Browning quotes few of George Eliot's casual remarks; but among the few is one which, coming from the lips of a singularly shrewd observer, will be interesting to many readers, and might provide a topic for a debating society of university men. She received the hospitality of both Oxford and Cambridge; and when asked by the author what struck her as the most salient difference between the social features of the two universities, she replied that "at Cambridge they all seemed to speak well of each other, whereas at Oxford they all criticised each other." Whether a society for mutual admiration or a society for mutual criticism should, on the whole, be preferred, is a question which allows of very pretty fencing on the part of the answerers thereof.

The scheme of the series to which Mr. Oscar Browning's book belongs demands that biography proper shall be supplemented by a certain amount of criticism. The author's critical remarks are, as a rule, so sound, intelligent, and discriminating that I must needs regret the rapid diminution of available space which compels me to take note only of those passages in which he seems—to one reader at least—to miss the mark. Sometimes the failure is a mere matter of language, where what is meant is right, though what is said is wrong, as in the sentences in which "imagination" is used for "invention." For example, Mr. Oscar Browning says of the early period during which George Eliot drew largely on memory for her raw material, that at this time "she moved timidly and with caution in the domain of imagination"; and in contrasting Adam Bede and The Mill on the Floss with Silas Marner and Felix Holt, he says that the latter, as distinguished from the former, "may be classed together as pure efforts of imagination," meaning of course that in these books the plots and characters are the outcome of unaided invention.

More important is what appears to me a curious error of ethical interpretation in the sentence where Mr. Oscar Browning says—

"If the lives of Dorothea, of Maggie Tulliver, of Romola, are failures, it is not because George Eliot wishes to teach that most lives are and must be failures, but because she believes that such failures are preventible, and that it is our duty to prevent them as far as possible."

Surely these wonderful portraits leave in the mind something more germinal and fruitful than this sterile commonplace; surely her true teaching is that some kinds of failure are dearer and worthier than some kinds of success, and that—if I may quote some words which I wrote about Middlemarch long ago—

"we are left with the conviction that the higher life, the life of great ideals never attained and of divine hopes never fulfilled, is, in spite of all its failures and disappointments, not merely the higher but also the preferable life—that we would rather ten thousand times be Dorothea and Lydgate with their wrecked, broken careers, than we would be Celia and Sir James Chettam and Mr. Brooke with their placidly fulfilled existences and their commonplace contents."

It is all the more curious that Mr. Oscar Browning should have failed to perceive this burden of significance, because he himself, in his adjudication of supremacy to Daniel Deronda among George Eliot's novels, recognises her doctrine of life, and applies it in the domain of art, where it ceases to be true, or is, at any rate, not true to the same degree. He describes the work just mentioned as "an attempt to solve deeper problems than she had before attempted, and to convert art to higher uses—perhaps a partial failure, but one more excellent and memorable than many successes."

This remark, well aimed as it is, does not hit the gold; for while it is true that a strenuous but unsuccessful endeavour after nobility or sanctity is worth more than a successful achievement of Philistine respectability, it is hardly true that an unsuccessful attempt to paint a "Sacrifice of Iphigeni" or a "Last Judgment" must be preferred to a little bit of homely genre work which is satisfying in conception and perfect in execution. I agree with Mr. Oscar Browning in thinking Daniel Deronda a noble work of art; I agree with him in regarding with contempt the majority of the popular criticisms upon it; I can follow Prof. Dowden in thinking that it is George Eliot's only work in prose—he says her only work absolutely—in which "the poetical side of her genius obtains adequate expression"; but I cannot think that, simply in virtue of the complexity of the issues with which it deals, this admittedly "partial failure" is to be placed above such unequivocal successes as Adam Bede and Middlemarch.

Nor can I echo Mr. Oscar Browning's doubt whether George Eliot "ever wrote what can strictly be called poetry," or his assertion that "she lacked the passionate fire, without which no poet can excel, and the gift of melodious language." Here, however, he has the majority of critics on his side, and to enter upon the controversy would be like challenging to a tilting match the doughtiest knights of the Round Table. I am not a master of subtleties; and in forming a judgment as to whether this or that utterance in verse is, or is not, poetry it is my habit to apply a very simple and commonplace test. I simply ask myself whether the matter of thought or emotion there expressed in verse could have been expressed with equal effect in the form of prose, and when compelled to answer this question in the negative I conclude that I am dealing with poetry. George Eliot's verse does not always compel this answer; but with me it compels it so frequently and at times so resistlessly that I simply cannot help feeling that its claims to be what its writer intended it to be are, for me, substantiated. For such a discussion there are, however, more fitting places than the close of an already too long article; and perhaps, whosoever held, it might not be very fruitful in result.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE.

A History of Austro-Hungary from the Earliest Time to the Year 1889. By Louis Leger. Translated from the French by Mrs. Birkbeck Hill. With a Preface by Edward A. Freeman. (Livingtons.)

We are very glad to see M. Louis Leger's useful Histoire de l'Autriche Hongrie in an English dress. The plan of the work is quite original, and excellently carried out. It is to allow the various peoples obscured under the hegemony of Austria to tell their own story to the world. What is Austrian nationality is a question frequently asked, and it is a very difficult one to answer. We have Hungarian aspirations, Bohemian aspirations; Poles contending with Ruthenians, Croats, Serbs, and Slovaks resisting the Magyar; subtle intricacies about an Italia irredenta, to which a Roumanie irredenta seems likely to be added—but none of the peoples connected with these disputes are willing to style themselves Austrians. We all know more or less of the rise of the Eastern duchy (Oesterreich), about which Mr. Freeman has spoken in such decided tones; and most of us can quote the epigram, one line of which ends "tu felix Austria, nube"; but few persons besides the historian of the Norman Conquest can tell us all the minute claims to the various portions of that political mosaic, Austria. She has had a terrible task to keep herself alive, and has partly done it by stimulating the antagonisms of young and, in some cases, half-civilised nationalities. It is a dreary story throughout: bloody tribunals such as those of Prague and Eperies; hired assassins to remove generals whose talents and ambition were occasionally obscuring the imperial puppet at the head; sanguinary reprisals in the case of unsuccessful rebellions; the patriots decapitated in the public square at Prague after the battle of the White Mountain, and the fourteen generals hanged at Arad in 1849. If we look at the line of sovereigns who have been Austrian dukes, German emperors, and, finally, since 1806, Austrian emperors, it is difficult to find any conspicuous for moral or intellectual gifts, with, perhaps, the single exception of Joseph II., an honest blundering man, who himself owned that he was a conspicuous failure and nothing more.

Up to the present time we have had the history of Austria written only from a German standpoint—as a German power, in fact. Such is pre-eminently the case with the laborious and carefully compiled work of Coxe. He is full of German emperors, archdukes, and archduchesses; but the great streams of national life underneath he hardly perceives, or if he does perceive underrates their importance. M. Leger tells us out of what Austria grew; how she acquired her great possessions, especially Hungary and Bohemia, and upon the ruins of what earlier civilisations her advancing footsteps trod. How few people, to judge from the newspaper correspondents, are aware of the constitutional rights of the Magyar and the Chekh! By nineteenth-century English readers they are treated as tiresome agitators, seeking for a kind of home rule, to which they have no claim whatever. A mere glance at a few pages of Mr. Freeman's vigorous preface to this work will do much to undeceive them.

Never did a more polyglot realm exist, or one less of nature's making. If we survey it closely we shall find it a seething mass of petty animosities. The Teuton sits, as it were, supreme in his capital of Vienna—a city with no glorious national traditions, enjoying a celebrity for magnificence and luxury more than anything else, and generally deserted by its masters at the great crises of its history. Leopold flies before the Turk, leaving it to be defend by Sobieski, and afterwards affects to treat him with contempt, because he is only an elective and not an hereditary king. The Magyar oppresses the Slovaks, Serbs, and Roumanians, and does what he can to stifle their languages. He aims at an impossible solidarity in his own division of the empire, but has been assisted by the Slovak Kossuth and others in his struggles. In another part of the empire we find the Catholic Pole at variance with the Orthodox Ruthenian, whose religion and language—identical with that of Southern Russia—make him an object of suspicion. In the cis-Leithan portion, the Bohemian and Slovene are struggling against the German.

In his account of the various elements which make up this composite empire M. Leger has not forgotten to tell us something of its various authors. To the German element of these literatures the Austrians, it is true, have not contributed much, for Grillparzer, Zedlitz, and Anastasius Grün are not great writers; but there is the story of Chekh and Magyar literature which has its salient points. Of course M. Leger does not forget to tell us something of the soul-stirring strains of the young Tyrtæus of 1849, Alexander Petöfi. That bright July day was a sad one for his country when this patriot went down under the Cossack lances among the maize-fields of Fejeregyhaz, at the terrible battle of Segesvar. Close by, his body rests in the pit where the slain were thrown in a heap after the battle; but not a Szekler passes by without putting a stone upon the grave.

In connexion with Bohemia the great Hussite movement meets with careful treatment in M. Leger's hands, and forms one of the most interesting parts of the volume. We see the Austrians gradually closing in on the unfortunate country: the executions at Prague in 1547 of the burghers who had ventured to resist the encroachments of Ferdinand I.—he had been King of Bohemia since 1526—the terrible battle of the White Mountain; the devastation and depopulation of the country, are all fully narrated. Similar is the story of Hungary since the fatal battle of Mohacs; but the culmination was the great insurrection of 1848-9 and the sanguinary reprisals, which sent a thrill of horror through Europe. The Slovenes have but little history, but the story of the suppression of Protestantism among them by Ferdinand II. is a sad one.

M. Leger writes, on the whole, in a fair and impartial spirit, and is free from the conventional Chauvinism, although he has some pages to write which must be rather humiliating to French self-love, as when he tells us of the manner in which Napoleon ordered Andreas Hofer to be shot.

The lists of sovereigns at the end will be found very useful, as enabling the reader to understand many of the obscure parts of the history, such as, for instance, the union of Croatia with Hungary, the relations of Transylvania to Hungary and Vienna, the duchy of Carinthia, and all the dynastic inter-lacements of this perplexed history. Very useful also is the table of gains and losses in territory, so that we may shape out in our minds the fluctuating fortunes of the Habsburgs.

A laudable custom with M. Leger is to give the Slavonic and Magyar names of the towns, which are obscured to us in most publications by being travestied in a German form. A little confusion, however, arises here and there, because sometimes we get the Slavonic and sometimes the German name of the same place. Perhaps M. Leger has erred on the side of excessive accuracy when he gives us the Ruthenian or Malo-Russian Lviv for Lemberg or Lwów, the capital of Galicia. But the desperate attempts to Germanise the Slavonic and Magyar peoples, which culminated in the centralising measures of Joseph II., have not succeeded. At the beginning of the present century the Bohemian or Chekh language seemed on the point of extinction. It had almost become a tongue of peasants, and bade fair to follow the fate of its sister-language, Polabish, heard in certain districts of the old kingdom of Hanover at the commencement of last century, and now, like Cornish, preserved only in a few vocabularies and other fragments. In the fifteenth century Wendish, or Sorbish as it is better called, had been heard in the markets of Leipzig, which itself bears a Slavonic name—Lipsk, “the city of lime trees.” About the same time Slavonic ceased to be spoken in the island of Rügen. Even Dobrowsky, who may be said to have founded scientific Slavonic scholarship, never dreamed of a complete resuscitation of Chekh. He wrote books about it and edited its literary monuments in the same spirit as that in which Mr. Whitley Stokes edits Irish texts. He would indeed be surprised, if he were alive at the present day, when the once despised Bohemian language has its newspapers in abundance, its learned reviews, its poets and novelists, its national theatre—nay, more, its university. Such has been the result of the patriotic efforts of a band of scholars who about sixty years ago founded the National Museum. At Agram flourish a Croatian university and a Croatian Academy, with two learned reviews, Rad and Starine. Of Galicia and Hungary little need be said. The former is but a limb torn from the Polish trunk and still throbs with vitality, with a Polish university at Cracow in full vigour. Hungary's progressive strides have been very rapid, and its literature has developed greatly since the century began. Scanty enough as it was beforehand, for—with the exception of a few tedious lives of saints in verse and two or three songs—we have nothing worth mention in the language till the “Venus of Murany” of Stephen Gyöngösi at the end of the seventeenth century. It is a pity that while so jealously guarding his own rights, the Magyar has been so churlish and niggardly to his Slavonic brethren—

We must be grateful to Mrs. Birkbeck Hill for her accurate and scholarly translation. The book will certainly be welcome to all students of history and all readers who want to see what that very composite, piebald, and polyglot thing the Austrian empire is, which continues to survive, although in the present century it has been two or three times to all appearance on the point of dissolution.

W. R. MORFILL.

A Southern Planter. By Susan Dabney Smedes. (John Murray.)

THIS book has at least two claims to favourable notice. It records the life of a patriotic citizen, high-minded, and absolutely incere; and it presents a view of what may be termed the amenities of slavery and of the redeeming features of a system which sorely lacks an apologist. In the eyes of some the book will have an additional value from having been reintroduced to the world by Mr. Gladstone with words of warm commendation. But even with these advantages it is not likely, we fear, to attain any wide popularity. The hold taken upon the public mind by the presentation of the case in Uncle Tom's Cabin is too firm to be much weakened by this true, but less sensational, publication; and the present generation, at any rate, will continue to believe that the “institution” perished through its own unmitigated wickedness. In spite of what Mrs. Smedes says to the contrary, English people and Northerners will maintain that Thomas Dabney was quite as exceptional in the treatment of his slaves as he undoubtedly was in the conduct of his life; and they will see in his scrupulous honesty towards his creditors a quixotic vein which might account for anything in his other relations.

Certainly Thomas Dabney was no ordinary man. With that curious hankering after a distinguished ancestry which most Americans exhibit, his daughter and biographer claims for her father a descent from the ancient family of d'Aubigné.

“We find,” she says, “the name on the rolls of Battle Abbey among the list of knights who fell at Hastings. Others survived the Conquest, and are mentioned in Hume's History as champions of Magna Charta."

Then we are told—the interval is long and the transition abrupt—

"After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) a branch of the d'Aubigné family left for ever the land of their ancestors, because they could no longer there worship God with freedom of conscience. They took refuge in Wales. Somewhere between 1715 to 1717 two brothers, Cornelius and John d'Aubigné, left this land of their adoption, and sailed for America. Perhaps about the same time their brother Robert came over and fixed his home in Boston."

In the absence of proofs, we confess that we hesitate to accept this Huguenot descent. The Daubenys are a widespread family in the West of England; and cadets from the main stock are likely enough to have found their way across the Atlantic and lost, upon the other side, the spelling of their name which they seem here to have rigidly preserved.

Be that as it may, the subject of this biography is quite sufficiently strong to stand by himself. In his last letters to his son, his own feelings on this head are well expressed:

"I never could forget that I was born a gentleman and incapable, consequently, of a mean action. But it is one thing to maintain one's self-respect, and another to take up a too extravagant notion of one's true standing with his fellow-men."

We may dispute Thomas Dabney's doctrine of innate and inherited nobleness; we cannot dispute his possession of it. In the early portion of his life, which began so long ago as 1798, he was a prosperous man, and many are the acts of liberality and neighbourly kindness which his biographer is able to record. His plantation in Mississippi was considered a model one. Men came from all quarters to learn his methods—the most efficient of which seems to have been a distribution of presents or prizes among his negroes. Every week during the season the cotton-pickers received a bonus in addition to their wages; and when a man or woman picked six hundred pounds of cotton in a day, a five-dollar gold piece was the reward. And in other ways his slaves were exceptionally well treated:

"The thrifty negroes made so much on their chickens, pea-nuts, popcorn, molasses-cakes, baskets, mats, brooms, taking in sewing, and in other little ways, that they were able to buy luxuries. Some of the women bought silk dresses; many had their Sunday dresses made by white mantua makers."

Meat was plentiful, blankets were lavishly distributed, the sick were nursed, and, when the weather was rainy, the women were brought into the house and taught to sew and to mend clothes.

The proprietor had his reward. He could boast that he had never had a drunkard on his plantation, and scarcely ever a thief. His thoughtful kindness—never tinged with sentimental weakness—made him a master whom servants could both love and respect. How genuine was their attachment to him was proved by their reluctance to leave him when freedom was proclaimed, and by their behaviour to him in the hour of his adversity, for that came to him also in its turn. Death entered the family, and then there fell upon it the shadow of a war which Thomas Dabney foresaw from the first would be terrible and ruinous. But he could not shrink from taking his part in it. He it was who originated the scheme for raising money for the Confederate government on the security of the cotton then in the hands of the planters. These bonds supplied the sinews of war during the early part of the struggle. Later on he and his son engaged more actively in the war; but it was not so much in opposing the Federals that he gained his laurels as in meeting undauntedly the sea of troubles which, when the war ceased, threatened to overwhelm him. He had of course, to let his slaves go free and to commence life anew with an empty house, a denuded plantation, and nothing that could be turned into money but five bales of cotton. But this was not the severest part of his trial. The old slaves—and even those who were afterwards hired—still insisted on calling him "master" as though it were a term of endearment, and worked well for him. Economy and energy bade fair to bring things back again to a prosperous condition when, suddenly, ruin came upon him. Before the war he had been asked to be security to a friend for a large amount. The friend proved treacherous; and, at sixty-eight years of age, Dabney had to surrender everything and, with a large and helpless family on his hands, to begin a struggle for existence in a country where even young men scarcely knew how to earn a livelihood. The manner in which he accepted the situation showed of what stuff Thomas Dabney was made. He set himself, in spite of his years, to the task of paying in full every dollar claimed; and, by hard manual labour, rigid self-denial, and unremitting toil, he succeeded in his object.

One of his old servants wrote to him in 1867 in these terms: "Though freedom has been given to the coloured race, I often sigh for the good old days of slave times, when we were all so happy and contented." Without sharing in this pious wish, we may venture to doubt whether the gift of liberty, bestowed, without preparation, upon a race by nature and habit dependent, could prove an unmixed boon. Do not those most prize it who have spent most to gain or to keep it?

CHARLES J. ROBINSON.

A Song of Heroes. By John Stuart Blackie. (Blackwood.)

ANTICIPATING the censure of the "judicious critic," Prof. Blackie hopes "that the less fastidious student of human fates may not fail to find a fair amount of encouraging stimulus and healthy nutriment" in his new Legend of the Ages. He concludes his preface with these words: "For the sake of such students I shall be happy to have pleased less, that I may instruct more." In order to instruct it is necessary to please; and it is just the less fastidious student who requires to be pleased most. Nor is there, whatever may be said of his justice, a more trenchant critic than he. He divides books into two categories—readable and unreadable; and while he may include in the first Shakspeare and The Family Herald Supplement, the second is certain to contain Wither's Hallelujah and Watts's Hymns. On the other hand, the judicious critic, unimpelled by a merely instinctive hunger for healthy entertainment and excitement, is apt to develop a sophisticated taste for books that are "caviare to the general." He has even been known to go the length of making a somewhat similar distinction into readable and unreadable as the less fastidious student, with this difference—that he preferred the unreadable; as in the case of one capricious appetite, which, unable by any whet to appreciate the flavour of Ben Jonson—high enough for most palates—could yet find the soul of François Rabelais in The Life and Adventures of John Bunolo. An appeal from the judicious critic to the less fastidious student may therefore prove the selection of the greater of two evils. It is certain to be regarded by the former as implying a self-accusation of want of thorough conscientiousness in giving to the public work which, in the author's opinion, requires an apology.

It is only upon the "poetical treatment" that Prof. Blackie deprecates judgment. Of "the historical significance of this little book" he seems confident; and, so far as the plan goes, his confidence is not ill-placed. To select "a sequence of the most notable names in European and West Asian history during a period of more than three thousand years, and give a sketch of their lives, as the bearers and exponents of the significant ages to which they belong, is to write a history of the world which could hardly fail to have some interest, however inadequately treated. Prof. Blackie divides universal history into three periods—the Old World, the Middle Age, and the New World: the first represented by Abraham, Moses, David, Socrates, Alexander, Caesar, St. Paul; the second by Columba, Alfred, Wallace, and Bruce; the third by Luther, Cromwell, Washington, Nelson, and Wellington. The mere names are stimulating and nutritious; but although magnificent poetry could be written about them all, it will be seen that this is a scheme for a series of essays, and, with the exception of the disproportionate second period, quite a tolerable scheme—one upon which Prof. Blackie could deliver a course of racy lectures to fit audiences. Even regarded as lectures, however, these rhymes have shortcomings, arising from the point of view. The coign of vantage from which Prof. Blackie endeavours to survey the ages is a Scotch platform—an elevation from which it is difficult to obtain a very extended prospect, and where the view is liable to be intercepted by fogs of prejudice, of kettle-drumme patriotism and religious intolerance, with this, among other effects, that Jenny Geddes's stool looms through the mist like a new constellation. In spite of the unfavourable environment of the standpoint, he succeeds in catching a glimpse of America, and in his poem, "Washington," occur the two best verses in the book.

"Meagre souls there be who fancy
God as meagre as themselves,
That his tale of things was ended
With the books upon their shelves!

"With the record of their glories,
Battles, blunders, brawls, and blood,
When high-vaulting Whigs and Tories
Clutched the stars, or kissed the mud!"

These are clarion notes; but it is a shrill clarion, and there is a sound as of the clapping of wings.

And now we come to the capital charge against the book. It consists of about a thousand verses in the above measure. With Tenny's "Locksley Hall" to show how a hard-won victory may be attained, and Aytoun's Ballads as an example of the failure of high literary ability to dedoggerelise it thoroughly, it may seem to the less fastidious student incredible that a rapid writer like Prof. Blackie should have chosen this measure for a long work. The judicious critic is less astonished, for a merely imitative faculty is often unable to distinguish the paste brilliant from the diamond, even though the former be of its own manufacture. The ploughman's trot of the verses quoted is endurable for a little. But with spavined lines of this kind :

"And they hailed him, with rare blessing
For all people richly stored,
Father of the faithful, elect Friend of God, Almighty Lord"; with specimens of helpless rhymes like the following :

"They have landed in the shallows
'Neath thy sheltering wing, Cape Ood;
There they knee the sand in thankful Worship to their Saviour God"; with archaic grammar :

"Nor halted there but for to breathe
The landward air a little space";

when Nelson is treated thus :

"And they loved him—how they loved him!
For they said, 'Our gallant Nell
Holds a heart wherein a lion
Knows in kindly peace to dwell and when Oliver Cromwell broods "o'er the passionate yeast within," it is no wonder that the less fastidious student ranks A Song of Heroes with Wither's Hallelujah, and that the judicious critic is for once in a fair way to become injudicious.

With a lamb!"

In conclusion, two reflections suggest themselves. First: It is not the case that correctness is an essential of poetry; for the subtle melody of some of Blake's verses derives the added charm of irregularity from the hasty gathering, lest the dew should escape him, of wildwood flowers. Prof. Blackie in his unfortunate hurry has shaken the dew from all his posy. Secondly: Though it will not make a man an artist to shout "Art for itself!" till he be hoarse, yet the true artist does follow art for its own sake, knowing well that unless he has perfected his work to the best of his power, whatever else it may do, it will neither make for righteousness nor for the beauty that includes righteousness.

JOHN DAVIDSON.

The Crown Prince and the German Imperial Crown. By G. Freytag. Translated by E. Duncan. (Bell.)

HERR GUSTAV FREYTAG has peculiar qualifications for adding to the literature of reminiscences which is fast gathering round the figure of the Emperor Frederick. The well-known German novelist enjoyed his prince's friendship for many years, and was by his side during most of the Franco-German War. His book would indeed have been given to the world at an earlier date had not "circumstances robbed the author of all inclination to speak about the deceased during a period of unhappy excitement." But, in spite of this delay, its publication has aroused considerable controversy. A perusal of Herr Freytag's pages shows that this might have been anticipated. His affection for the emperor does not prevent him from passing more than one severe criticism; and, though Herr Freytag pleads that friendship must give way to devotion to the truth, yet good taste and consideration for the living might have forbidden certain remarks which called forth indignant protests from one nearest to the dead. We need not, fortunately, deal with this painful subject.

The volume, however, has a historical significance which distinguishes it from a crowd of ephemeral competitors. Its title, The Crown Prince and the Imperial German Crown, strikes the keynote at once. How far did the late emperor originate the conception of the German empire, and what were the political and personal characteristics revealed by him in the most memorable effort of his life, which put him out of touch with the governing forces of modern Germany? This is the question put and answered by Herr Freytag. He proves that the idea of the new German empire took place in the Crown Prince's brain months before it became even a vague presage with the German people. When Bismarck was still hesitating about admitting the vision as a practical possibility, the heir to the Hohenzollern throne was sketching out the lines upon which the edifice was to be reared. But it was just the difference between the Crown Prince's enthusiasm and the minister's reluctant caution that distinguishes the statesman from the idealist. The Crown Prince forgot the pregnant words of Schiller's astrologer—

"Das Erste aber und Hauptsächliche Bei allen irdischem Ding is Ort und Stunde."

By neglecting "Ort und Stunde" he very nearly plunged the projects he had at heart into premature political difficulties. The conflict between his idealism and the stern spirit of Prussian "Realismus" was still more strikingly manifested in the imaginative trappings with which he endeavoured to surround the empire. His impulse was to regard the new dignity of the Hohenzollerns as derived in apostolical succession from the Holy Roman empire—an impulse of which Herr Freytag gives significant illustrations. It was this large difference of sentiment and temperament between the emperor and the German people which accounts for the fierce hostility which his accession provoked.

THE AUTOGRAPH MSS. OF BOSSUET.

Histoire Critique de la Prédication de Bossuet, d'après les Manuscrits autographes et des Documents inédits. Par l'Abbé Lebarq. (Paris: Desclée, de Brouwer et Cie.)

THIS is a work of patience and research. Its object, according to the author, is twofold: to trace in Bossuet's original manuscripts the method of composition which he followed, and to clear up doubtful points in the chronology of his sermons. It is characteristic of Bossuet's method of composition that the ex-ordium or beginning of a sermon was the part which he wrote the last, and with the greatest care, often on a separate sheet of paper, which he added to the manuscript. The study of these autograph manuscripts is full of literary interest. In the variations of Bossuet's pen we can watch the change from the ornate diffuseness of French style in the sixteenth century to the severe and majestic grandeur of the seventeenth. Here is a passage in one of his most eloquent sermons which Bossuet rewrote twice. It is a description of the hollowness of human effort to add dignity to life by the multiplying of riches and titles. Bossuet places before us a proud nobleman who, "little in himself and ashamed of his littleness, seeks to increase and multiply himself in his titles, possessions, and vanities."

"Toutefois, qu'il se multiplie autant qu'il lui plaira, et autant, si vous voulez, que ces miroirs qui multiplient dans leurs diverses faces les objets jusqu'à l'infini, il ne faut pour l'abattre qu'une seule mort, et une seule chute pour tout casser."

In his second version Bossuet strikes out the comparison of the mirror, and the familiar phrase, "une seule chute pour tout casser." The passage reads thus:

"Toutefois, qu'il se multiplie autant qu'il lui plaira, il ne faut pour l'abattre qu'une seule mort. Mais les hommes ne s'en soucient pas, et dans cet accroissement infini que notre vanité s'imagine, ils ne s'avisent jamais de se mesurer à leur cercueil, qui seul néanmoins les mesure au juste."

The thoughts are grand, but the expression lacks majesty. This is the final cast:

"Toutefois, qu'il se multiplie tant qu'il lui plaira, il ne faudra toujours pour l'abattre qu'une seule mort. Mais, mes frères, il n'y pense pas; et dans cet accroissement infini que notre vanité s'imagine, il ne s'avise jamais de se mesurer à son cercueil, qui seul néanmoins le mesure au juste."

In determining the chronology of the sermons, the Abbé Lebarq chiefly relies on the variations of Bossuet's spelling, which admit of being reduced to two systems—the phonetic system followed in his youth, the etymological system adopted in his mature age, with a transitional stage between them.

The abbé lays down the following rules which appear to him established by a collation of the MSS.:

"1. Tout manuscrit exclusivement phonétique est antérieur à 1653, du moins au milieu de cette année.

"2. Un manuscrit où les formes phonétiques dominent se placera dans cette année, en tenant compte des indications liturgiques.

3. Pourront se placer en 1654 les œuvres qui contiennent un mélange des deux systèmes, à doses à peu près égales.

4. Attribuer à 1655 ou 1656, en optant d'après les circonstances connues et d'après la valeur des œuvres, les discours où les rares vestiges d'habitudes phonétiques ne seront plus que des rechutes involontaires."

The book contains a most valuable appendix—a table of the chief orthographical peculiarities of fifty of Bossuet's MSS. This table may be consulted with profit by historians of the French language. A fact is mentioned which lends interest to the question of phonetic versus etymological spelling. In later years, when Bossuet had established his reputation as a master of French style, he was consulted on this question by his colleagues of the Academy; and he answered thus:

"Il ne faut pas souffrir une fausse règle qu'on a voulu introduire d'écrire comme on prononce, parce qu'en voulant instruire les étrangers et leur faciliter la prononciation de notre langue, on la fait méconnaître aux Français mêmes. . . . On ne lit pas lettre à lettre, mais la figure entière du mot fait son impression tout ensemble sur l'œil et sur l'esprit, de sorte que, quand cette figure est changée considérablement tout à coup, les mots ont perdu les traits qui les rendent connaissables à la vue, et les yeux ne sont pas contents."

Twice Guilty. By W. W. Fenn and E. Salmon. (Drane.)

MR. ANDREW LANG began a recent article on Wilkie Collins's novels, in the Contemporary Review, with the remark that "next to reviewing a book without reading it, the most unfair thing one can do is to read it for the purpose of reviewing it." I would fain believe that it is because I have read Blind Love with the object of saying what I think of it that the impression it makes upon me is disappointing and unsatisfactory. It was otherwise, I remember, with The Woman in White and No Name, each of which ingenious romances exerted a spell over the reader against which the most critical intelligence was not proof. It may be that a peculiar method, which has a certain special interest when it is first met with, ceases to please and rather palls on the attention when it is often repeated. But in whatever way the fact may be explained, the truth must be told that the last successor of the thrilling tales on which Wilkie Collins's fame depends has none of their singular fascination. Yet the materials out of which that fascination was drawn are present in this story also. The plot is striking, the situations are dramatic, and the characters differ, as Wilkie Collins's characters always did, from the ordinary run of men and women. Incidents and coincidences, which might be supposed to possess interest from their appositeness, their unexpectedness, or the effect with which they happen at the right or the wrong moment, are brought together with the old skill, and play their part in furnishing the requisite number of chapters. But when all is said and done—when every chapter and incident has been read and followed—the reader finds that he has got nothing for his pains. Not one of the characters lives in his mind; and the plot, elaborate though it is, has taken no more hold upon him than any story of crime and detection—of wrong or remorse—he has read in the newspapers. Indeed, the hold he is conscious of is even less strong, for in the case of a newspaper revelation the actors in the story are actual men and women, whereas in the present instance they are only moving figures. It would not be possible to follow one of them into any other conditions of life, and imagine how they would act in those new surroundings. They are constructed to do the particular things the exigencies of the story require them to do, and some of these, even as done by automata, have the appearance of being over-much forced. One cannot believe that "blind love" was ever so blind as to impel a high-minded young woman to voluntary disgrace and crime, or that the love of a high-minded man could outlast her wilful preference for badness in his rival to good in himself.

Amid the fresh natural interests which belong to country life, and which form the most attractive feature of Midst Surrey Hills, Mr. Bickley places in strong contrast the religious and social differences between Church and Dissent. His principal characters are a liberal-minded, good-tempered country rector; a youthful, but somewhat bigoted, Wesleyan minister; a rather lonely, interesting girl, whose bringing-up has been among Methodists; and an artist-nephew of the rector. The young "travelling preacher" and the artist are rival lovers of the heroine, who is much perplexed between them. She cannot love the minister; and though she becomes engaged to the artist, a complication arises from his susceptibility to the charms of a certain Lady Helen MacAusten. After this point the story, previously a little flat, grows lively and dramatic. Hugh Fenton, the Methodist, endures to the end the trial to his affections. His long unhappy struggle is graphically told, and he learns at last the virtue of self-sacrifice. There is not much to be said for Philip, his rival, who is good as an artist, but weak as a man. Mr. Bickley's women, except Fee, are rather aimless creatures, whose horizon is bounded by matrimony. In keeping with such an outlook is the passion for kissing that prevails. This is all very well in an invalid like Mrs. Melcroft; but it becomes objectionable when everybody adopts the habit, and it especially detracts from the dignity of the rector. The charm of the story lies in its genuine atmosphere of rural life. Before the reader has got far into it this charm will take hold of him, and he will find himself absorbed for the time being by the unsophisticated people and their fine moorland surroundings. It would be well, however, if Mr. Bickley would let his characters speak more often for themselves, instead of telling their story for them.

Though in many ways very able, An Unruly Spirit strikes one as being a good story spoiled. A delightful idyll might have been made of the loves of Edgar Penrice and Gladys, if the wicked fascinations of Mrs. Calverley had been kept out of the book. But it is conceivable that the ardent novel-reader would not have enjoyed the simpler tale as much as he (or she) will relish the complications which Mrs. Gowing has chosen to weave into her chapters. Those complications, however, are of a kind that would be unpleasant in real life, and one feels them to be equally undesirable in a story. No doubt they are such as sometimes occur, and the novelist may argue that it is his business to portray human nature as it is; but the less some aspects of human nature are seen the better. Still, from the circulating-library point of view, An Unruly Spirit is unquestionably a thrilling story. It begins with the innocent loves of a boy and girl, which run pleasantly on till the witching and unprincipled married flirt appears on the scene. Her mission is to captivate everybody; and she succeeds in it as such women mostly do, with the result that her victims, and a good many others, are plunged in misery. She gets her deserts in the end, but not until much ruin has been wrought. Gladys, pure and blameless though she is, has her entanglements too, apart from those in which Mrs. Calverley involves Edgar. Indeed, for readers who like a strong plot, here is satisfaction enough.

Mr. Oswald Simon's story suffers from the fact that it is so evidently written with a purpose. The most tractable reader objects to be lectured—he has a still stronger objection to be sermonised—when he wants to divert himself with a novel. But a reader who does not impatiently put down The World and the Oloister, on discovering the drift of it, will be rewarded for his charity toward the author. For the religious and political teaching of the story is entirely wholesome. The hero is, perhaps, too much of a paragon; but he and the heroine between them arrive at some excellent rules of conduct and bases of belief. The cloister is not allowed to mar the gentle life of the girl; and the temptations which the world has for the man leave his fine nature untouched. One would like to believe that it is not impossible for a member of Parliament to keep clear of party ties, and to form perfectly independent views on public questions; but one fears that such a member would be held a nuisance in the House. Each side would, no doubt, court his support, but neither would be disposed to look up to him as a final arbiter and infallible guide, as happened in the case of Roderick Huguenot. The Duchess of Boughton is a fairly well-drawn character; but Father Guinton, though the reader sees less of him, is a more real personage. Roderick talks well, but he talks too much; and it is noticeable that all the characters speak by the book. Nobody ever drops into a colloquialism or ventures on a natural abbreviation. In this respect the story lacks ease.

A hero so fickle and so foolish as George Longford, who tells his own story in Satan's Bonds, could not fail to fall into entanglements, but it is too bad in such a case to charge them upon Satan. How, from being the manager of an Explosives Company in a remote district of Yorkshire, he became associated with Nihilists, the husband of two wives, the witness and object of a terrible sacrifice, and one of the chief actors in a very tragic drama, he tells for himself in a spirited narrative; and it would not be fair to anticipate his story. But one wonders, after reading the story, that such a woman as Gertrude—Louise may be left out of the question—could have conceived so noble an affection for so weak a man.

If the "shilling shocker" must needs be read, Twice Guilty may be recommended as a harmless, though sufficiently exciting, specimen of the article. It concerns a crime for which first one man and then another is found guilty. Both the real criminal and the innocent man escape—the latter after a perilous and thrilling experience, with which a ghostly visitation has much to do—but the sinner is, of course, at length found out by his sin. Strong incidents in these cheap tales occasionally have the merit of conveying a good moral.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

SOME BOOKS ON THE COLONIES.

The Bermuda Islands. By Angelo Heilprin. (Philadelphia.) This contribution to the physical history and zoology of the Bermudas is the result of a visit made to the islands by Mr. Heilprin, with a class of ladies and gentlemen, in the summer of 1888. The main object was to examine the structure of the coral reefs in this group of islands—the most northern coral islands in the world, and in this respect and others a notable example of the influence of the Gulf Stream. As was to be expected, the fauna has proved from this examination to be a wind-drift and current-drift one—the aerial being North American, and the aquatic Antillean. Mr. George Murray has recently pointed out in his Catalogue of the Marine Algae of the West Indian Region that it is necessary to include the Bermudas in the West Indian marine-plant region; and this zoological confirmation of his opinion is overwhelming in the amount of evidence. As regards the results of Mr. Heilprin's examination of the coral reefs, it is not very easy to estimate their precise nature. There is no room for doubt that he regards them as a striking refutation of Mr. John Murray's theory of coral-reef formation and a strong support of Darwin's theory on the subject. Mr. Heilprin takes up the attitude of a partisan in the controversy, and he maintains it with affirmations of his belief more abundantly than with the enforcement of his argument in the legitimate way. The supporters of either side in the controversy are by no means united among themselves; but it is easy to classify them as on one side or the other in the matter of the great question at issue. It is here that Mr. Heilprin's evidence is of doubtful value; and, such as it is, one would be more inclined to give it consideration but for the obvious bias in his views, which is carried too far when it appears in the résumé of the literature of the subject in the appendix. However, there is a good deal of bitterness on both sides, and Mr. Heilprin is nowhere discourteous to his antagonists. He even speaks of the "venerable Duke of Argyll," and we are far from suggesting that the democratic institutions of his country have unfitted the author for selecting the proper designation of His Grace. The narrative account in the early chapters of the book is very American in style, and the "processed" illustrations harmonize with it. It would be ungracious to end this notice without a hearty acknowledgment of the abundance of excellent work and sound observation contained in it, apart from the controversial portion.

Obeah; Witchcraft in the West Indies. By Hesketh J. Bell. (Sampson Low.) There is hardly a subject of greater fascination than Obeahism. It interests students of comparative religions, of magic, of folklore—and of medical jurisprudence, for the matter of that. Information on the subject is only to be obtained in scraps from scattered sources; and it is hard to get any from the negro himself, since he generally stands in too great terror of the whole business to know much about it. The title of this little book is apt to excite a lively anticipation of interest, but there is a good deal besides Obeah in it. In fact, the material for a book strictly on Obeah does not exist, but Mr. Bell gives a fairly good account of what is known, with a number of new stories, some of them excellent; for example, that of the miraculous shower of stones, and the furniture removing story, both of them on the authority of a French Roman Catholic priest. There is little virtue in miracles in these days, or his reverence, having seen these things, would have become a priest of Obeah. The book deals mostly with Grenada, and the manner of life of its coloured inhabitants, their superstitions, &c. Mr. Bell writes very pleasantly; and, being in such an excellent position for the study of Obeah, it is to be hoped that he will penetrate further into its mysteries and furnish a more exhaustive treatise on the subject. He certainly missed an excellent opportunity when he did not turn and join in the procession to propitiate the "Mamadjo" of the Grand Etang, a lake in a crater in Grenada. The present writer (who must have offended that siren by a natural history exploration of her domain) can testify to her uncanny but beautiful surroundings. Mr. Bell tells us more in a small space of the ways of the West Indian negro than any writer since Père Labat.

The Lesser Antilles. By Owen T. Bulkeley. (Sampson Low.) This is a guide book for travellers and intending settlers in the British Islands of the Antilles, written by a business man. It describes the voyage out and a cruise among the islands, noting their produce and capabilities of development. The author is behind the time in some respects, since a number of his grievances, or rather the colonial grievances that he ventilates, have been righted. It is anything but well written, and the historical statements of its author are sometimes startling. For example, speaking of Trinidad: "However, thank Heaven! in 1797, after the dispersal of the Armada, Admiral Harvey frightened the Spanish Admiral into burning his ships, and General Abercrombie," &c.

It was, indeed, after the dispersal of the Armada! Mr. Bulkeley is generally practical enough in his advice as to new products, &c.; but he surely yields too much to sentiment for a man of business when he advises the trial of barley on the strength of Robinson Crusoe's success with that crop in Tobago, not the least among the strange surprising adventures which we may all believe without this literal desire to imitate.

John G. Paton, Missionary to the New Hebrides: an Autobiography. Edited by his Brother. Second Part. (Hodder & Stoughton.) We do not remember to have met with the first part of Mr. Paton's Autobiography; but, judging by the present work, it is not surprising that within three weeks of its appearance a second edition was called for. Mr. Paton is a member of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and a missionary to the group of the New Hebrides. We have read his narrative with deep interest. It is that of a single-minded man of unfeigned piety, whose whole heart is in his work. He begins with a tour in Australia, undertaken for the purpose of raising £5000 to purchase a mission ship. In this he was successful. His earnestness and sincerity stood him in good stead, as at a later period in Scotland, when in eighteen months he raised £9000 for a like object. The scene of his missionary labours was Aniwa, one of the smaller islands of the New Hebrides, measuring only nine miles by three and a half; and there he, Mrs. Paton, and their child landed in 1866, the only whites among a heathen population. He tells his story of how he gradually gained influence and converted the natives simply and graphically. Nor is the story without its comic element. Mr. Paton knows how to make the most of the grotesque incidents which not unfrequently occur even in such serious occupations as his. He is entirely free from cant. It is true that he frequently makes use of a special religious phraseology; but it is invariably with perfect sincerity. These phrases are no unmeaning forms to him. He sees the Divine influence in every occurrence of his life; and his faith recalls the religion of a simpler and more robust age. One cannot help feeling some misgiving as to the condition of these converts after their instructor is removed. Mr. Paton would feel none; and, in any case, we trust it will be long before his influence fades. The editor has done his work well; but we think he has made a mistake in omitting his brother's chapter on "The Kanaka, or Labour Traffic in the South Seas." Mr. Paton's experience on this subject must be of great value. He speaks of the good effect wrought by the punishments inflicted by men-of-war:

"The rumour of the Curaçoa's visit and her punishment of murder and robbery did more, by God's blessing, to protect us during those heathen days than all other influences combined. The savage cannibal was heard to whisper to his bloodthirsty mates 'not to murder or to steal, for the man-of-war that punished Tanna would blow up their little island.'"

"COLONIAL CHURCH HISTORIES."—New Zealand. By Henry Jacobs, Dean of Christchurch. (S.P.C.K.) Dr. Jacobs has produced a very complete history of the Anglican Church in New Zealand, from the first missionary efforts of Samuel Marsden to the present day. The book is divided into three principal parts: "The Missionary Period," "The Period of Organisation," and "The Period of Subsequent Growth and Development." Of these, the first is undoubtedly the most attractive, although it is not till the second period that we come to the great name of Selwyn. Of the grandeur of the character of George Augustus Selwyn, and of the splendour of his services to the church, there cannot be two opinions. Nevertheless, we think that he, with his brother Bishops of Wellington and Nelson, was precipitate in petitioning the Queen for permission to surrender the letters patent by which he and they were created bishops of their respective sees. The transaction which the author calls the "tangled and painful story" of Dr. Jenner and the see of Dunedin showed a signal want of judgment in those persons who were mainly responsible for it. This sad and—may we not write?—deplorable business began in 1865, and even now can hardly be said to be set at rest, inasmuch as the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has printed at the end of the present volume a letter from Dr. Jenner with the date of March, 1889, giving his version of the transaction. We gather that the society sympathises with him, though Dr. Jacobs is decidedly of an opposite opinion. It is remarkable in a new country to find a diocese like that of Christchurch largely endowed with land. These estates provide handsome incomes for the bishop and his chaplains, for the dean, and for elaborate services at the Cathedral.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IN view of the probable sale of the world-renowned, but almost inaccessible, Middlehill Library at Cheltenham, which was formed early in the present century by Sir Thomas Phillipps, we understand that the British Museum and the universities of Oxford and Cambridge have agreed to unite in securing those MSS. which it is thought of importance to retain in this country. The total sum of money for purchases to be guaranteed by these three bodies will probably amount to £20,000.

MISS AMELIA B. EDWARDS is coming home to England by the Etruria, which leaves New York on March 29. During her tour in the United States, she will have delivered about 116 lectures in all, of which thirteen were addressed to colleges and universities, including Princeton, Columbia, and the University of Pennsylvania. The Peabody Institute at Baltimore altered its constitution in her favour, so as to permit a woman to lecture there for the first time. Her course of lectures on Egyptology will shortly be published—simultaneously in this country and America—with a great number of illustrations, reproducing the lantern slides. Another subject on which she will probably write something is that of American Museums, in which she has long taken an interest.

THE council of the British Association have addressed a memorial to the Secretary of State for India, calling attention to the importance of the ethnographic and anthropometric researches which have been conducted in Bengal during the last five years by Mr. H. H. Risley with conspicuous success, and suggesting that they should be extended to other parts of the country. They also express a hope that the approaching census may be utilised to obtain lists of the exogamous and endogamous subdivisions of castes.

THE legislative department of the government of India has recently printed at Calcutta, in a volume of 248 pages, ninety-nine of the minutes written by Sir H. S. Maine, in India, between the years 1862 and 1869, with a note by him on Indian codification, dated July 17, 1879.

AT the next meeting of the Philological Society, to be held at University College, Gower Street, on Friday next, March 21, at 8 p.m., Prince Louis-Lucien Bonaparte will read his long-promised paper on the results of his visit, last year, to Southern Italy and Sicily to study the dialects of Albanian, Illyrian, Greek, Gallo-Italic, and Provençal, still spoken in parts of those regions.

PROF. F. HIRTH, of the German Oriental Institute—who is about to return to China for another term of service in the Customs—has transferred the whole of his invaluable collection of Chinese MSS. and printed books to the Royal Library of Berlin. Among the MSS. is a copy of the Hua-i-yi-yü, a polyglot work of the sixteenth century, which contains the only record we possess of the lost language of the Jur-chin Tatars, the ancestors of the present Manchus. We may add that a list of Prof. Hirth's chief services to Sinology is given in the current number of Trübner's Record.

THE Clarendon Press has nearly ready for issue a second series of Prof. Skeat's Principles of English Etymology, dealing with the foreign element in the language.

THE next volume in Mr. Walter Scott's "Contemporary Science" series will be The Village Community, with special reference to its Survival in Britain, by Mr. C. Lawrence Gomme, with numerous maps and plans. We understand that the author uses some of the results of folklore to prove that the English village community is not simply an economical institution, but that it contained also much of the old tribal religion.

MR. TIGHE HOPKINS's story of Irish life—The Nugents of Cariconna—will be ready next week at the libraries in three volumes. Messrs. Ward & Downey are the publishers.

A NEW story of adventure, by Mr. James Greenwood ("The Amateur Casual") is issued this week under the title of Prince Dick of Dahomey; or, Adventures in the Great Dark Land. A new shilling book by the same author—The Chronicles of the Crooked Club—is also on the eve of publication.

Perseverid: the Career of Ninian Jameison is the title of a humorous story by Mr. John Davidson, for which Mr. Harry Furniss has just completed several illustrations. It will be published next month by Messrs. Ward & Downey.

Ida: an Adventure in Morocco, is the title of a new story, by Mabel Collins, which will be issued shortly in one volume.

MESSRS. REMINGTON & Co. have in the press a new work by Dr. Gordon Stables, entitled The Mystery of a Millionaire's Grave.

MESSRS. HENRY & Co. announce, as the first of the "Bouverie" series of cheap novels, Twist Light and Dark, by Messrs. J. T. Grein and C. W. Jarvis.

ARTHUR YOUNG's Tour in Ireland is to be reprinted in full, with introduction and notes by Mr. Arthur W. Hutton, Librarian of the National Liberal Club, forming two volumes of "Bohn's Standard Library."

MESSRS. WARD & DOWNEY's forthcoming additions to their cheap "Library of Fiction" are Lil Lorimer, by Theo. Gift; The Head Station, by Mrs. Campbell Praed; Miracle Gold, by Richard Dowling; Logie Town, by Sarah Tytler; and Black Blood, by George Manville Fenn.

MR. THOMAS GREENWOOD is now passing through the press a third edition, almost entirely rewritten, of his little book on Free Public Libraries.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON announce the following:—Joints in our Social Armour, by Mr. James Runciman; The Christian Ministry: its Origin, Constitution, Nature and Work, by the Dean of Norwich; The Voices of the Psalms, by the Bishop of Ossory; The New World of Central Africa, by Mrs. Grattan Guinness; Professor W. G. Elmslie, D.D.: Memoir and Remains, by the Rev. Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll; My Lady Nicotine, by Mr. J. M. Barrie; Rescuers and Rescued: Experiences among our City Poor, by the Rev. James Wells; Vent Creator: Thoughts on the Holy Spirit of Promise, by the Rev. Handley C. G. Moule; The Makers of Modern English, by W. J. Dawson; Until the Daybreak, and other Hymns and Poems, by the late Dr. Horatius Bonar; Nunnery Life in the Church of England; or, Seventeen Years with Father Ignatius, by Sister Agnes, O.S.B., with Introduction by the Rev. W. Lancelot Holland; Eccle Venit, by the Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon; and the following volumes of "The Expositor's Bible":—Dean Chadwick's The Book of Exodus; the Rev. Dr. Monro Gibson's The Gospel of Matthew; the Rev. George Adam Smith's The Prophecies of Isaiah, Volume II.; and Prof. G. T. Stokes's The Acts of the Apostles.

THE following are the lecture arrangements after Easter at the Royal Institution: Three lectures on "The Place of Oxford University in English History," by the Hon. George C. Brodrick; three lectures on "The Art of Engraving," by Mr. Louis Fagan; three lectures on "The Natural History of Society," by Mr. Andrew Lang; three lectures on "The Heat of the Moon and Stars," by Prof. C. V. Boys; six lectures on "Flame and Explosives," by Prof. Dewar; three lectures on "Colour and its Chemical Action," by Capt. Abney; three lectures on "Excavating in Greece," by Dr. Charles Waldstein; three lectures on "The Ballad Music of the West of England" (with Musical Illustrations), by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould. The Friday evening meetings will be resumed on April 19, when a discourse on "Electric Welding" will be given by Sir Frederick Bramwell; succeeding discourses will probably be given by Sir John Lubbock, Mr. R. Brudenell Carter, Prof. Raphael Meldola, Prof. A. C. Haddon, Prof. Boyd Dawkins, and other gentlemen.

JUDGING by the sales, it would seem that just at present autographs are more in demand than books. During the last three days of next week Messrs. Sotheby will sell a collection of letters and MSS. of quite exceptional interest, the greater portion of which were brought together by the late Abraham Hayward, who seems to have made the most of his opportunities. The chief feature of the collection is that it comprises so many series of connected letters. Apart from moderns, such as Burns, Byron, Shelley, and Thackeray, the gem of the whole is a sonnet of Tasso, bound up with a number of illustrative documents—though possibly some Americans might value higher the original draft of Gen. Lee's farewell address to the Army of Virginia, which certainly ought to recross the Atlantic. There are also several proof-sheets of De Quincey, with his characteristic corrections; and four volumes annotated by the poet Gray, which come from Mason's sale. Many of the letters throwing light on literary history have never been published.

WE have received a pamphlet containing a lecture on "Contemporary English Literature: its Sources, Characteristics, and Tendencies" delivered in January, by the Rev. Percy W. Myles, before the Rudy Institute in Paris. It covers the whole of the present century, and every department of literature, within some twenty-four pages; but it is written with such brightness, and with so much knowledge, that we have found it neither tedious nor impertinent. The author inclines to the conclusion that science is crushing out poetry.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

CANON WESTCOTT, Dr. Lightfoot's old friend from schooldays, has been appointed his successor in the bishopric of Durham. He has been regius professor of divinity at Cambridge since 1870.

WE regret to record the death of Dr. S. M. Schiller-Sinensky, reader in Talmudic and Rabbinical literature at Cambridge. He died on Tuesday, March 11, at an advanced age. Almost the last thing that he can have written was the obituary notice of his old teacher, Prof. von Hase, of Jena, which appeared in the ACADEMY of February 1.

MR. SAMUEL DILL, late head master of Manchester Grammar School, has been appointed by the crown to the professorship of Greek in Queen's College, Belfast.

MR. P. GILES, of Gonville and Caius College—whose recent etymological paper read at the Cambridge Philosophical Society is reported on another page—has been elected to a fellowship and classical lectureship at Emmanuel College. And another alumnus of the same college, Mr. Edwin Abbott, who has not yet passed the second division of the classical tripos, has been elected to a fellowship at Jesus.

A COMMITTEE has been formed at Oxford to collect subscriptions for a memorial to the late Aubrey Moore. It is proposed (1) to have a portrait of him painted, to be placed in the hall of Keble College; and (2) to establish a studentship for graduates, to promote the study of theology or of philosophy and science in their relation to theology.

ABOUT two hundred volumes from the library of the late Dr. Hatch have been presented to Mansfield College, Oxford, by a group of senior members of the university, including heads of houses, professors, and tutors.

MR. ARTHUR J. EVANS, keeper of the Ashmolean, was to deliver two public lectures, on Friday and Saturday of this week, on "Recent Acquisitions of the Museum."

THE Cambridge Press announces Memorials of the Life of George Elwes Corrie, D.D., formerly Master of Jesus College, edited by Mr. M. Holroyd.

THE annual report of the Fitzwilliam Museum Syndicate mentions the following as the most important acquisitions during the past year: A MS. benedictional of the ninth century, probably written by a Celtic monk of St. Gall; the Poyntz-Caraw Book of Hours, a richly illuminated English MS. of the middle of the fourteenth century; a fine French MS. of the fourteenth century, containing a life of the Virgin, a Bestiary, and Burnetto Latini's Tesoro in the original French. Mr. T. C. Harding, high sheriff of the county, has presented to the picture gallery Sir J. E. Millais's "The Bridesmaid," a highly finished early manner, dated 1851. Mr. Pendleton has continued his donations of previous years by presenting 255 volumes of music. The catalogue of music, printed and MS., by Dr. Mann and Mr. Fuller Maitland, is well advanced.

AN address—signed by the representatives of most British universities, as well as by other distinguished musicians—was presented last week to Lord Knutsford, Secretary of State for the Colonies, protesting against the issue in this country of degrees in music by the University of Trinity College, Toronto. Lord Knutsford considered that a case for interference had been made out, and promised to refer the question to the law officers of the crown.

PROF. W. P. KER, Mr. Henry Morley's successor in the chair of English literature at University College, will deliver a lecture before the Ethical Society in Essex Hall, Strand, on Sunday next, upon "Boethius and the Platonic Tradition."

THE twelfth anniversary of the Johns Hopkins University was celebrated at Baltimore on February 22, when a letter was read from President Gilman, dated from the ruined theatre at Taormina. It was announced that Mr. J. R. Lowell had been obliged, much against his will, to be the first incumbent of the lectureship of poetry, which was founded last year by the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Turnbull; but that it would be inaugurated in 1891 by Mr. Edmund C. Stedman. We may add that the publication agency propose to issue, in a volume of about 450 pages, the principal literary essays and studies of Prof. Gildersleeve, many of which deal with subjects of general academical interest.

THE Nation of February 27 prints long extracts (from the Dedham Historical Register) from the diary of a Harvard freshman of 1758. One entry is "October 9. Some examined about Bulraging Monis." Monis, it is explained, was teacher of Hebrew; and "Bulraging" is apparently identical with "bullyragging," of which Dr. Murray does not cite an English use earlier than 1807.

THE Revue Critique of March 3 contains a review of the two volumes of Essays by the late Mark Pattison, published last year by the Clarendon Press. It is written by M. Paul de Nolhac, who naturally devotes himself mainly to the appreciation of the French scholars of the sixteenth century. Concerning the essays dealing with university reform and ecclesiastical history, he observes: "la personnalité religieuse de l'auteur et ses idées anglicanes y sont nettement marquées."

ORIGINAL VERSE.

LIVING, THOUGH THE DATE BE OLD.

"But, dead! All's done with: wait who may,
Watch and wear and wonder who will.
Oh, my whole life that ends to-day!
Oh, my soul's sentence, sounding still,
'The woman is dead, that was none of his;
And the man, that was none of hers, may go!'"

ROBERT BROWNING (Too Late).

'Tis a gold box set with pearls
All around the quaint old lid;
And her eyes, 'mid sunny curls,
Partly seen, and partly hid,
Smiling, gaze into your face
With a dainty charm and grace.

Raise the lid; some words are there,
Graven deep into the gold—
Words that breathe a great despair,
Living, though the date be old.
"Seventeen ninety, sixth of May,
She died. God teach me how to pray."

I could tell her name and age,
Write the story of her life.
But why open the shut page?
She has rested long from strife,
And a hundred years have fled
Since the day that she lay dead.

Close the box—why linger here?
Sixty years ago he died,
Held no other woman dear,
Never wife was by his side;
Ended was life's golden day,
"Seventeen ninety, sixth of May."

FLORENCE PEACOCK.

OBITUARY.

DON VICENTE DE ARANA.

THE Euskal-erria, we regret to state, announces the premature death of Vicente de Arana, one of the best poets of Biscay. He wrote in Spanish; and, if he cannot be placed in the highest rank as an original poet, he is among the best of translators. His versions of Longfellow's "Evangeline," of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" and "The May Queen," in Oro y Oropel (Bilbao: 1876), are admirable specimens of that poetical prose which French critics prefer to verse for rendering poetry in a foreign tongue. His Ultimos Iberos (Madrid: 1882), a collection of Basque legends told in Spanish, is of little value to students of folklore; but it is written with inimitable grace, and has been much borrowed from, and plagiarised by, subsequent writers. Both these works were reviewed in the ACADEMY at the time of their publication. We had always hoped for something more from his pen, but death has frustrated our expectations.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE two double numbers of the Altpreussische Monatsschrift for July to December, 1889, deal, with a single exception, with subjects of antiquarian interest in the past history of East and West Prussia. That exception is an article by Dr. Emil Arnoldt (in Heft V.-VI.) on Kant's relations to Lessing, especially as concerns their views on reason and revelation, on historical as opposed to philosophical certainty, and kindred topics. The paper deserves careful study from any interested in Kant's religion of mere reason. In the same Heft, Dr. Krumboltz combines his history of the dealings of the Teutonic order with Samagitia; T. Wagner communicates documents in reference to two young noblemen of the lower Rhine who joined in a crusade against the Lithuanians in 1331; J. Sembrzycki gives some interesting details of manners and customs forty years ago in a Lithuanian village called Padrojen; and A. Treichel collects some of the cries heard in the Prussian provinces at the game of skittles. In the concluding number of last year are contained a paper by H. Freytag on the settlement of a Jesuit mission in Danzig towards the end of the sixteenth century; some specimens, communicated by K. Lohmeyer, from the notebook of the financial steward or surveyor of Duke Albrecht; a lecture by G. Krause on a cross erected near Galtgarben to commemorate the War of Liberation; the first part of an article by H. Kiewning on the part played by the same Duke Albrecht in the league of German princes against Charles V.; and some account, by J. Sembrzycki, of the state of the Marienburg under the Poles after the fall of the order to which it had belonged. The same part includes R. Reicke's careful and comprehensive Kant-bibliography for the year 1888.

BROWNINGIANA.

THE following memorial has been presented to Mr. Robert Barrett Browning. The signatures have come mainly from students connected with various educational movements.

"The undersigned, being a few among the many who have gathered knowledge, and hope, and inspiration from your father's poems, venture to ask you to publish a selection of them at a price that will place them within the ownership of all. They are emboldened to ask this because they believe there are thousands who would profit by their perusal who are unable to do so now because of their high price. They would respectfully suggest to you the issue of one or two shilling volumes, containing such of the shorter poems, from the earliest to the latest, as best illustrate the special characteristics of your father's genius and teaching. They do not suggest any mutilation of the longer poems, for the sake of "extracts," regarding this course as bad in itself, and harmful to genuine students. They know that such volumes would be welcomed by many to whom Robert Browning is an illustrious name, honoured from afar, but not yet known as a friend and guide. Believing that he has made the world so much the richer by his life's work, they ask that some share of the wealth of wisdom and poetry he so freely bestowed shall be placed within the reach of all who are able to appreciate its value. And the number of these is growing greater every day."

IN reply to a letter from Dr. Furnivall—making enquiry as to the maternal grandfather of Browning, who is supposed to have come from Dundee—a correspondent of the Dundee Advertiser gives the following facts. On June 27, 1769, William Wiedemann, described as a sugar refiner, purchased a property in the Seagate in Dundee. In the earliest Dundee Directory, which is dated 1782, there appears the name of "Mrs. Wiedman, Seagate." On June 21, 1787, the property was sold by William Wiedemann, mariner, "eldest lawful son and heir of William Wiedemann, sugar refiner." It may be assumed that this is the father of Sarah Anne Wiedemann, whom we know to have become a member of the Congregational Church in York-street, Peckham, in 1806, to have been married to Robert Browning senior in 1811, and to have died in 1849.

BROWNING in Gratz, the capital of Styria, is the last thing we hear of. Dr. Robert von Fleischhacker, one of the Early English Text Society's editors, has lately settled at Gratz as a Privatdocent; and, as in duty bound to his English friend Dr. Furnivall, he has set up a sort of English-reading club and begun lectures on Browning. "And now, as the great poet is dead, people who had not even known his name when he was alive are highly interested in him." Hence an urgent appeal for the Browning Society's publications to be sent to Gratz, as a help to Dr. von Fleischhacker's lectures on the poet.

WE would briefly call attention to a little volume, entitled "Robert Browning: Chief Poet of the Age," by William G. Kingalund, Second Edition (Jarvis). The writer was for many years honoured with the poet's friendship; and the biographical sketch, while not containing much that is new, is written with good taste. The epithet "unique" is, however, an awkward one to apply to a marriage. The book is illustrated with the now familiar portrait taken by Mr. Grove, and with the facsimile of a letter in which Browning informs the author of the death of his "belovedest of friends," M. Milsand of Dijon, to whom the 1863 edition of Sordello was dedicated.

WE may also mention Browning's Message to his Time: his Religion, Philosophy, and Science, by Dr. Edward Berdoe (Sonnenschein), which consists mainly of papers read before the Browning Society. It is illustrated with a photograph of the poet, taken by Messrs. Elliott & Fry, which we venture to think the more characteristic of the two; and also with three facsimiles of letters from Browning to the author, one of which deals with the "holy cause" of an anti-vivisectionist hospital.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ORTHOGRAPHY OF THE ORMULUM.

Oxford: Feb. 20, 1890.

HAVING recently had occasion, in connexion with my last letter to the ACADEMY (February 22) to examine the Ormulum MS., I discovered an interesting fact in connexion with the orthography which has hitherto escaped notice, and which is, I think, worth putting on record.

For the guttural and palatal spirants Orni retains, as is well known, the Old English 3 (in the former case adding an h), while for the guttural stopped consonant, as in god, he employs a sign which is represented in the printed editions by g. But in the printed editions the sign g is not restricted to the guttural stopped consonant, but is used also in words like egge (= Modern English "edge"), where the gg had the dzh sound. In other words, the printed editions of the Ormulum make no difference between egge (= "edge") and eggenn (= "egg on"), though the pronunciation of the consonants in the two words was, in Orm's time, the same as now, i.e., dzh in the former case and a stopped g in the latter. But on examining the MS. I found that, though the editors make no difference, Orm did. The letter with which he always denoted the guttural stop (as in god, gladd, eggenn, &c.) is perfectly distinct from the sign which he used to express the dzh sound (as in egge "edge," seggen "to say" &c.). The latter, which I will denote in this letter by g, has the form of the continental g; while the former, which I will denote by g, may be described as a sort of compromise between the Old English 3 and the continental g. It has, in common with this latter, the closed upper part, thus differing from the Old English 3; but it has, in common with the Old English 3, the straight horizontal top stroke, which projects to the left as well as to the right of the letter. This straight horizontal top, especially that part of it which projects to the left, is its most characteristic feature, and serves to distinguish it from the g, from the round top of which a short sloping stroke extends to the right, there being no stroke whatever to the left. The absence of any stroke to the left of the top of the g at once distinguishes it from the g. Orm never confuses the two signs, but always uses them correctly, g invariably denoting the guttural stopped consonant, and g the dzh sound. I give a few instances—the pronunciation, g or dzh, is added in brackets, the number which follows denotes the number of times I have found the word in question: egge "edge" (dzh—3) is in each case written with gg; eggenn "to egg on" (g—4), egginn (g—1) are in every instance spelt with gg. The verb biggenn "to buy" (dzh—18), is always written with gg, being thus invariably distinguished from biggenn "to dwell" (g—20). The verbs leggenn "to lay" (dzh—2) and seggenn "to say" (dzh—18) are in every instance written with gg, while the Scandinavian trigg "faithful" (g—3), kaggerr-le33c "love" (g—2) are spelt with gg.

If any proof is needed that Orm's seggen, &c., really had the dzh sound, it is afforded by the use of the sign g in the Romance word gyn (Ormulum, ed. Holt, i. 245, purh snottur gyn, "through wise art"). This gyn or gin appears in other early Middle English writings, meaning, as here, "skill, art," or "a mechanical contrivance, a machine." It also got to be used in a bad sense, "cunning," and "a snare," surviving in the latter meaning in the Modern English "gin." It comes from the Latin ingenium, through the medium of the Old French engin. Some writers have, it is true, regarded it as Scandinavian, and brought it into connexion with the Old Norse ginna, "to deceive." But the pronunciation of the Modern English word entirely precludes the possibility of a Scandinavian origin. Moreover, the various Middle English meanings are more easily and naturally explained from the Romance engin than from the Norse ginna.

The Romance origin of gyn then being admitted, its initial consonant must, in Orm's time, have had the dzh sound; thence, as we have every reason for supposing that Orm did not use this sign for more than one sound, we may assume that, wherever it occurs, it had the value of dzh. The fact that in words, whether proper names or not, taken over from the Latin Orm always uses g before back vowels and g before front vowels, serves as a further confirmation of this. He writes quabriggan, galile, and augustuss, but egippte and magy (= magi).

The later language shows that, when ng was originally followed by i or j, the g underwent the same assimilation as the gg; instances are "hinge," "singe," &c., so that one would expect to find Orm in such cases writing ng and not ng. Now, wherever ng is preceded in native English words by e, an i or j must have originally followed the ng (to this there are very few exceptions—the preterite heng, "hung" is one), so that wherever the combination eng occurs, we should expect to find it written eng, unless the g was immediately followed by some consonant which protected it from assimilation, as in ennglish, lenngre, or in the case of Scandinavian words. The words in question are (*h*eh)enngell, "angel"; henngedd, &c., from henngenn, "to hang, crucify"; brengdenn, "thronged"; wengess, "wings"; strengenn, "to strengthen"; geenge, "a company"; gengenn, "to avail, assist"—but they are always written with g, never with g. In the case of (*h*eh)enngell, the explanation is simple enough. In all the cases except the nominative and accusative singular the g was protected from assimilation by l (enngless), and the influence of these forms protected the g in the nominative and accusative singular; but, in the case of the other six words, no similar explanation is possible, so that, unless we are prepared to adopt the unlikely assumption that in Orm's dialect assimilation only took place in the case of gg, but not in the case of ng, we are driven to the conclusion that all the six words are of Scandinavian origin. In his article on the Scandinavian loan-words in the Ormulum (Paul und Braune's Beiträge, x. 1 ff.) Brate comes to the conclusion, on quite other grounds, that henngedd, brengdenn, and wengess, are Scandinavian; but the remaining three he regards as native English, because of the lengthening of the root vowel before ng. But, if we suppose strengenn, geenge, gengenn to belong to an older stratum of loanwords borrowed previously to the lengthening of e before ng, that objection would lose its force.

I hope to publish complete lists of the words in which the two signs respectively occur in one of the next numbers of Herrig's Archiv.

"COCK."

Oxford: March 11, 1890.

Dr. Johnson, in his Dictionary, under the word "Cock" (under which he includes four or five distinct words), has sense

"5. The notch of an arrow. 6. The part of the lock of a gun that strikes with the flint [from cocca, Ital., the notch of an arrow. Skinner]."

This sense 5, Johnson, contrary to his usual practice, supports by no quotations. He does not even add the note Dict., indicating a word or sense which he inserted on the authority of Bailey or other earlier lexicographer. And so far as I have been able to see, the sense is not in any previous dictionary. It is not in Cockeram, Bullokar, Blount, Phillips, Coles, Cocker, Kersey, or Bailey. It has been "compiled" from Johnson into nearly all subsequent dictionaries (except Richardson), as those of Webster (who properly gives Johnson as his only authority for the sense), Worcester, Craig, Ogilvie, Cassell, Century Co. The three last-mentioned make the sense into a distinct word—very properly, for if it had any existence at all, it would of course have nothing to do with cock, the fowl; but they do not mention that they are merely taking an unverified item from an earlier dictionary. The unwarned reader might suppose that a duly authenticated fact of the language is put before him.

I do not know anything of this alleged word or meaning; no quotation for it has been obtained by our readers; no mention of it has been found in any contemporary work or article dealing with matters of archery, or describing arrows. The well-known and universally-used name for the thing in question is nock, nocke, for which quotations are plentiful as blackberries, and which is dealt with at large by Ascham in Toxophilus (Arber, 127 sq.).

Whence, then, did this alleged "cock" originate? As we have seen, Johnson had no literary or dictionary authority for it. I believe the thing to be substantially an etymological figment, founded upon Skinner's conjectural derivation of the cock of a gun cited by Johnson. Skinner, ingeniously but wildly, guessed "cock of a gun," and to "cock a gun," to be expressions transferred to firearms from the bow or arbalest, and to originate in the It. cocca, "notch of an arrow"; accoccare, "to set in the nocke, to nocke" (Florio). So French ccche, cocher in analogous senses. Hence it was a ready inference that if the "cock" of a gun was identical with It. cocca, Fr. coche, then "cock" must at some earlier date, in English, have meant the nock or notch of an arrow. And in accordance with this we find that in Johnson this sense is actually introductory to 6: "The part of the lock of a gun that strikes with the flint." But the supposed derivation is utterly baseless. The "cock" of a firearm, originally a cock-shaped device for holding the match and bringing it gently down upon the powder in the pan, was, as we know, named from the bird, and had nothing to do with It. cocca. And with it the imaginary "cock" = nock of an arrow disappears.

The only person who appears to have done any work at the point since Johnson's time is his latest editor, Dr. Latham. He seems to have looked for evidence of the existence of the alleged sense, and, finding none, to have given it up, inserting instead of it:

"Cock [German, Kock = arrow] Vertical feather in an arrow duly notched (whence, probably, the notion of pointing or direction); part of the lock of a gun in which the flint is fired, or which explodes the cap."

Here we hardly know whether to marvel more at the magic by which a "German Kock = arrow" is momentarily called into existence in order to supply a wanting derivation, or at the skilful manipulation of Johnson's entry, by the ejection of cocca and "notch," and the affiliation of the "cock" of a gun to the "cock-feather" of an arrow, the upstanding central feather of the three, usually of a distinct colour, so as to indicate at a glance the upper side of the shaft, "as it were to gyve a man warning to nocke ryght" (Ascham, 132). It has been reserved for later ingenuity to combine Latham's derivation with that for which it was substituted, and to connect the cock-feather itself with cocca. The Imperial Dictionary explains "cock-feather," historically, in archery as "the feather which stood upon the arrow when it was rightly placed upon the string, perpendicularly above the nick or notch." But the Century Company, in their adaptation of this, turn it into "cock-feather: in archery, the feather which stands up on the arrow when it is rightly placed upon the string, perpendicularly above the cock or notch." Are we to infer from the change to the present tense that this is a description of existing things, and that American archers and archeresses say "cock" when we say "nock"; or does it merely mean that "cock" has been so sequaciously compiled into dictionary after dictionary that the latest compilers have unsuspectingly taken it for a genuine, and even living, word?

THE INVENTION OF PRINTING.

Cambridge: March 10, 1890.

I am glad to see it stated in last Saturday's ACADEMY, on Mr. W. M. Conway's authority, that to assign the so-called Costeriana to Utrecht as the place where they might have been printed, as Dr. Campbell does in his Annales de la Typographie Neerlandaise, is a "hopeless misconception of Mr. Bradshaw's meaning."

I was fully aware of Mr. Bradshaw's intense dislike of this "Prototypographie Neerlandaise à Utrecht" started by Dr. Campbell, as he conveyed it to me in plain language on the morning that he had received Dr. Campbell's Annales, and several times afterwards. And Mr. Conway will find a statement to that effect on the very p. 34 of my Haarlem not Mentz, from which he quotes. But I felt some scruples in elaborating this point further on my own testimony, after Bradshaw's death, as I was not aware that he had expressed himself to anybody else on this particular question. I have, therefore, not "failed to see Mr. Bradshaw's point," as Mr. Conway seems to think.

But though I knew that Mr. Bradshaw would not plainly say that the Costeriana were printed at Utrecht, I do not see that I was wrong in saying that he "suggested" that place as their original home. He certainly was understood to indicate so much by all those who had not the advantage of his verbal explanation, like Mr. Conway and myself. Bradshaw dealt exclusively with the Speculum; and in placing it under Utrecht, it was easy for him to explain that he did so on account of its woodcuts having been used there. But when we come to deal with the forty-six other works inseparably connected with the Speculum, and, following Bradshaw's plan, place them all at Utrecht, we could hardly avoid looking upon that town as their original home. It is at this stage that I think Bradshaw's plan would not work.

Mr. Conway thinks that anyone reading Mr. Bradshaw's Fonts of Type and then my Haarlem not Mentz would "see the difference between bibliography as an exact science and bibliography of the unreformed, pugnacious school." No doubt he would. But if he reads carefully, he will not fail to observe that Bradshaw dealt merely with types, presses, and books, which afforded not even a shadow of an opportunity for pugnacity. I, on the other hand, had to deal with all sorts of questions which had been debated, and debated hotly, for nearly three centuries, and which, since 1870, had all been turned topsy-turvy, or buried under a mass of misinterpretation, invective, and misstatement.

I had no desire to cope with this mass myself; but as, through Bradshaw's death, the task of writing the article "Typography" for the Encyclopædia Britannica devolved on me, I thought it necessary to deal with a portion of the controversy on the invention of printing in a separate work, so as to clear the ground for the bare statements of fact which I would make in that article. Hence my articles in the ACADEMY in the summer of 1887, reprinted later on under the title Haarlem not Mentz. If anyone dislikes the controversial part of that work, and cares to read anything written by me on typography, he will find nothing of a controversial nature in my article in the Encyclopædia, in which I have referred as readily to those whom I wished to "score off" as to those from whom I have learned, which shows, I hope, that my pugnacity is not without some generosity.

If Mr. Conway is of opinion that my pugnacity has damaged the cause of Haarlem, he certainly must think that the cause of Mainz and Gutenberg has, by this time, hopelessly broken down, as it has, of late years, been defended and upheld by one of the most pugnacious and vindictive authors on record. But why should not an author's arguments or facts be accepted or refuted, even if they are surrounded by some controversy?

I hope, before long, to deal with some of the points connected with the invention of printing on which new light has been thrown since 1887.

How Mr. Conway could call Signor Castellani's L'Origine Tedesca e l'Origine Olandese a "reply" to my Haarlem I do not understand. It is admittedly a review or résumé of my book. And the author, far from being "altogether" in favour of Mainz, as was stated a fortnight ago in the ACADEMY, only sums up in favour of Mainz, in a postscript, on account of the rediscovery of the original lawsuit of 1455 at Göttingen.

EARLY CONTACT BETWEEN CELTS AND SLAVS.

Oxford: Feb. 24, 1890.

Prof. Rhys having regretted, in the preface to his Hibbert Lectures on Celtic Heathendom, that so little is known about Slavonic Paganism which might afford some parallel illustrations, perhaps I may be permitted to point out several primitive Celtic terms which have survived in Slavonic, and still require to be identified and explained. They are quoted by Sáfárik in his Slavonic Antiquities (German ed. by Wuttke, 2 vols.; Leipzig: 1843), in vol. 1, p. 89, and again p. 400. In the first place, he remarks: "Vielfältig waren die Kelten mit den Slawen benachbart und standen mit ihnen in reger Verbindung. . . ." To prove this statement the following Slavonic words are cited as having come from a Celtic source: Obr, bolwán, chotár, brzda, týn, skála, teré, pawezá, báné, húl.

On the second occasion, where the same words are quoted again as Celtic remains in Slavonic, balwan or bolwan (more adequately transcribed in English, balván), which occurs in Russian and almost every Slavonic dialect, as well as in Lithuanian, denoting a wooden or stone block, a pillar, statue, idol (Miklosich's Etymolog. Wörterbuch, p. 7), is derived from an original Celtic peulwan.

Being unfamiliar with Welsh, Irish, and the other Celtic dialects, I have been unable to verify this word in the Glossaries; and the only trace I can find of it is in Le Gonidec's Dictionnaire Breton (Saint-Brieuc: 1850), where Pellvan is explained as:

"Pierre longue, élevée perpendiculairement en guise de pilier ou de pieu, colonne brute que l'on croit un objet du culte des druides. Ce mot est composé de peül=pieu, pilier, et de mân figure, personnage."

I trust some Celtic scholar among the readers of the ACADEMY may be able to throw further light on this primitive term with regard both to its meaning and cognate form in the other Celtic dialects.

THE UNIVERSITY OF TOMSK.

Warsaw: February 25, 1890.

In accordance with a resolution of the Council of State approved by the Emperor on May 25, 1888, the Imperial University of Tomsk was opened on July 22 of that year, with the single faculty of medicine.

Now we have on our table the first publications, which give us some idea of the beginnings of scientific life in the earliest university in Siberia. During the year 1888-89 there were seven professors (physics, chemistry, anatomy, histology and embryology, geology and mineralogy, botany, pharmacy) who constituted the Congregation of the university—and 72 students, including 44 born in Siberia, and 28 in European Russia. The university has a church and a college where live 58 poor students, assuredly not in the same comfort as their more happy brethren at Oxford or Cambridge. The library, at present not completely arranged, is divided into three sections, foreign (about 60,000 vols., mostly presented by Count A. G. Stroganoff); Russian, about 30,000 vols.; and the last, specially devoted to medicine (6000 vols.), founded chiefly under the direction of the curator, V. M. Florinski, who has presented many valuable books to the library.

B. ALEXANDRENKO.

[We append the following, which is quoted from the Times:

"The University of St. Petersburg numbers 1759 students, of whom 1228 are members of the Orthodox religion, 21 Armenian Gregorians, 172 Catholics, 199 Lutherans or members of the Reformed Church, three Anglicans, 135 Jews, eight Muslims, and three of other non-Christian cults. Divided into their classes in society, there are 1135 either noble or the sons of officials, 148 sons of notable citizens or of merchants of the first guild, 116 sons of clergymen, 280 of citizens—merchants of the second guild and industrialists, 51 peasants, eight Cossacks, and 21 of foreign origin. Of the students, 1728 were educated in classical gymnasia, five in ancient seminaries, and 26 in other educational establishments. The University of Helsinki has at the present time 1735 students, among whom there are 17 women. These are divided into the following faculties: 189 theological students, 601 law, 138 medical, 408 philological, and 399 natural sciences and mathematics."

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, March 16, 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "National Life and Thought in Switzerland," by Mr. Howard Hodgkin.

SCIENCE.

The Epistle to the Hebrews. The Greek Text with Notes and Essays. By Brooke Foss Westcott. (Macmillan.)

(Second Notice.)

DR. WESTCOTT'S commentary is crowded with matter—not in the sense that it is at all oppressively loaded with references, for the proportions observed in this respect are most judicious, and the type and arrangement of the printing are as attractive as possible—but only in the sense that it embodies a rich and ripe exegetical experience. It is a book which invites, and will repay, close study. Writing with the responsibility of one himself engaged in the work of teaching, Dr. Westcott evidently does not wish that the student should have his thinking done for him, so much as that he should be put into the paths which he can follow with most profit, and which will lead him furthest into the inner meaning of the Epistle.

The opening section of the Introduction, which deals with the text, is an illustration of this method. Dr. Westcott gives admirably grouped and selected lists of the characteristic readings of the leading uncials and cursives; but he leaves it to the student to work through these lists and draw out their significance. He might also be encouraged to carry them a step farther, by collecting in the same way the more marked peculiarities of that interesting MS. M., though this is partly done for him in connexion with the allied text of the corrections in MS. 67.

Dr. Westcott rightly remarks that "the genealogy of the early Latin texts has still to be determined with the help of a fuller apparatus." It is well to remember in reading the commentary that where the Old Latin is quoted it is really only one form of the Old Latin—that represented by the Latin columns of D and E. The Vulgate is itself another and peculiar form of the Old Latin. It is not probable that Jerome made much alteration in it; and it seems, as Dr. Westcott remarks, to have had a different author from the translation of the text of St. Paul's Epistles. Yet a third type of text—that contained in the Freising fragments published by Ziegler in 1876 (r)—Dr. Westcott does not seem to notice. This is in practical agreement with the text used by St. Augustine.

In regard to the destination of the Epistle I am glad to see that Dr. Westcott calls attention, as I had myself done some time ago, to the mention of a συναγωγή Αἰβρίων (Εβραίων) in the Jewish inscriptions at Rome. He sums up rather in favour of the view that the Epistle was addressed to the Church of Jerusalem "or some sister Church in Palestine dependent upon it." He appears to reserve the possibility that it may have been intended for a society of Hebrew Christians in the Church of Rome. If, however, we believe (as I fully believe) that Dr. Westcott is right in inferring that the letter was addressed "to a definite society"—and that a small one (see p. xxxvi.)—"and not to 'Hebrew' Christians generally," does not this, in fact, exclude the Churches of Palestine? We could naturally address a letter to "the English congregation at Rome" or "to the English congregation at Paris," but not so well "to the English in London," and still less to "the English" of Reading or Oxford. The alternative seems to lie between the body of Hebrew Christians, as distinct from Hellenists in Jerusalem itself, and a small church of Jewish-born Christians in some such centre as Rome. But I do not see that Dr. Westcott meets the difficulties which would arise if the Hebrews addressed were those of Jerusalem. Could it be said that theirs was a Church which "had not resisted unto blood"? Were they likely to have a special interest in the fate of Timothy, or to receive a greeting from a colony of Italians? The writer of the Epistle speaks as if he and Timothy were about to visit them in the course of a pastoral tour (Heb. xiii. 23). Was that the natural way to describe a visit to the "Mother of all the Churches"? There is nothing in the Epistle to indicate that the Church addressed was one of such primary and central importance. Nor when we remember how the hearts of all Jews turned towards Jerusalem and think of their constant pilgrimages to the feasts and to the temple, can we be surprised if the Church in question showed signs of being attracted by the old Jewish ritual. It is true that after the Neronian persecution most of the Roman congregations also must have suffered in person as well as in property. It is possible that one of them may have escaped. We remember that the Jewish quarter was on the farther side of the Tiber, so that a congregation of Christians in that quarter could not easily be connected with the fire, which was the ostensible cause of the persecution. In any case, I should have some confidence in the negative conclusion that, if the traditional address is right, the Churches of Palestine are excluded and the Church of Jerusalem itself improbable.

On the question of authorship, I cannot help thinking that Dr. Westcott rather over-states the case against Apollos.

"There is not the least evidence," he says, "that Apollos wrote anything, or that he was the only man or the only Alexandrian in the Apostolic age who was 'learned . . . and mighty in the Scriptures,' or that he possessed these qualifications more than others among his contemporaries, or that, in the connexions in which they are noticed, they suggest the presence of the peculiar power which is shown in the Epistle."

It may be replied that the author of the Epistle is not likely to have been otherwise entirely unknown; that the number of prominent persons to choose between is very limited; that Apollos was certainly such a prominent person; that 1 Corinthians would be sufficient to prove that his preaching produced a great effect; and that the hints in that Epistle as to its character would agree well enough with what we find in the Epistle to the Hebrews; and, lastly, that he is the only leading Alexandrian Christian of whom we hear before the fall of Jerusalem. This, however, raises the fundamental question which Dr. Westcott touches on p. lxi., but which I should have been glad to see discussed at greater length. Is the type of teaching in the Epistle really Alexandrian or Palestinian? If the first of these alternatives is negatived, then I am by no means sure that as good a case as any may not be made out for the authorship of Barnabas. The other Epistle which goes by the name of Barnabas need not stand in the way. And Zahn has recently shown (Gesch. d. Kanons, i. 301) that, when Tertullian expressly ascribes the Epistle to Barnabas, he has at his back the tradition, not of the Churches of Africa, but, more probably, of those of Asia Minor, with, perhaps—as an extended area is required to satisfy the phrase receptor apud ecclesias—the concurrence of those of Antioch and Greece.

Dr. Westcott does not notice (and we cannot blame him for not noticing) the theory put forward by Overbeck in his Essays on the Canon (Chemnitz, 1880) that the Epistle to the Hebrews originally had a beginning which has been deliberately removed, and now has an ending which has been deliberately added in order to give the impression that St. Paul was the author. Dr. Overbeck is too apt to expend his real ability and learning in defending paradoxes and perversities; but this theory of his has acquired a somewhat greater importance from the fact that it has been endorsed by Harnack, who accepts it as if it were not only itself firmly established, but ready to be made the premises for further conclusions (Dogmengesch. i. 279, ed. 1), and also in its latter half, at least, by Weizsäcker (Apost. Zeitalt., p. 491). This again raises another fundamental question. At the time when such a change could alone have taken place was the primitive Church so anxious to claim for its documents the names of leading Apostles? Would it not have been as well content with the name of St. Barnabas as with that of St. Paul?

In taking leave of Dr. Westcott's Introduction I may be permitted to say that it seems to me to be excellently written to scale—if anything, too short rather than too long; that the collections of data in regard to the text are extremely instructive; that the patristic matter especially has been brought together with great fulness and care; and that the comparison of the Epistle with other types of teaching seems to me to abound with fine and true remarks.

The same would be true of the commentary as a whole. If it does not displace Dr. Davidson's little book in my affections, that is not because it does not add to it. It could not help doing this, both by its more elevated aim and by its rich and varied individuality. I shall henceforth use the two books together to check and supplement each other. With them in our hands I do not think that we often need go beyond our own language for an understanding of the Epistle. I must make in Dr. Westcott's case the one reservation, of which I spoke in my first article, of a certain occasional want of clearness. But that is a small matter, compared with the number of delicate, subtle, and penetrating observations which every reader of his commentary will take away with him. I wish that it were more in my power to illustrate these. I must, however, confine the few remarks, which are all for which I have space, to one or two doubtful or debated points.

For the original reading and rendering in Heb. i. 8 we were prepared both by the joint texts of Drs. Westcott and Hort, and also by a paper printed privately by Dr. Hort some years ago. I doubt if the sense ascribed to τραχηλίζω in iv. 13 can hold good. The evidence of Oecumenius clearly counts for nothing (see the preceding portion of the note, and compare the excellent note on τυμπανίζεν, xi. 35, where the Fathers were equally at fault). The action of "pressing down" is the opposite of what is wanted, which must be something to correspond to γυμνὰ (cf. γυμνασθεῖσα καὶ τραχηλισθεῖσα in one of the parallels aptly quoted from Philo). Mr. Rendall here seems to me to hit the mark when he argues that, from the wrestler's grip on the neck of an adversary, the word came to mean "having another at your mercy." In xii. 13, I quite believe that Dr. Westcott (with Davidson and some others) is right in translating ἐκτραπῇ "is put out of joint." This use is sufficiently attested by Hippocrates. I cannot, however, at all assent to the novel interpretation of x. 20, "a fresh and living way through the veil, that is to say, a way of His flesh." It is only by great straining that the "flesh of Christ" can be described as "a way" for the believer. It surely is not possible to separate διὰ τοῦ καταπετάσματος τοῦ ἔστιν τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ. This seems to me to give a simple enough sense, as it is explained by Theodoret and Primasius. The passage through the veil is a necessary stage in entering into the divine presence; to which might perhaps be added that for Christ this involved the veiling of his divinity by the assumption of human flesh.

A little while ago, in reviewing Dr. Hatch's Essays in Biblical Greek, I broke a lance in favour of the old rendering of διαθήκη by "testament" in ix. 17. Dr. Westcott argues impressively against this. Still it seems to me that the whole balance of the evidence as to usage is altered when we take in the Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs. They alone show how easy it is to pay too much deference to the Septuagint; and I greatly doubt Dr. Westcott's theory as to the symbolism of death in relation to the covenant.

"The unchangeableness of a covenant is seen in the fact that he who has made it has deprived himself of all further power of movement in this respect. While the ratification by death is still incomplete, while the victim, the representative of him who makes it, still lives—that is, while he who makes it still possesses the full power of action and freedom to change—the covenant is not of force."

I do not know what warrant there is for this. The dividing of the victims in the primitive custom alluded to in Gen. xv. seems rather to mean on the part of the maker of the covenant; "May I so be slain if I do not keep my word." And in the rite of Ex. xxiv. 3 ff., the sprinkling of the book and the people appears to denote primarily admission to fellowship or communion.

Sometimes, as here, Dr. Westcott appears to me to read foreign meanings into the context; but the passages where this is the case bear but a very small proportion to the vast number which the student will consult with equal pleasure and instruction.

In the copy which I possess of Bishop Lightfoot's Galatians (2nd edition, 1866) there are advertised as "preparing," besides "the Epistle to the Philippians" by the same writer, the "Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. Jude," by the Rev. F. J. A. Hort; and the "Epistles of St. John," by the Rev. B. F. Westcott. We know what Bishop Lightfoot has done, and Dr. Westcott has also completed a noble programme; but where are the Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. Jude? That, too, is a work which we would not willingly lose.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MĀDHAVA AND SĀYANA.

British Museum: March 8, 1893.

On reading Prof. Peterson's letter in the ACADEMY of to-day's date, I at once turned to our copy of Burnell's Vamcābrāhmaṇa; and as I noted that the edition, like many other of that eminent scholar's works was a small one (100 copies only), it occurs to me that possibly other readers of the ACADEMY may be in the same position as the scholars of Bombay, and have no copy of the book at hand.

I may mention, then, that Burnell (op. cit., p. ix., note) fully discusses the verse now quoted by Prof. Peterson. He declares, rather magisterially, that "bhogaṇḍika is certainly not a proper name, and never could be taken as such by anyone at all acquainted with Indian practice as regards names."

I may be only displaying my obtuseness; but, after several years' special study of Indian nomenclature, I own that I cannot see why Bhogaṇḍika should not be a name, when Bhogavarman and Bhogaśvāmin occur as such.

Burnell's next observation goes, I venture to think, too far, as he continues:

"It is enough to point out that a single instance of this word being used as a proper name elsewhere does not occur; it must, therefore, be taken as an attributive. . . .

He might have spoken with equal confidence as to bhogapāla, which the dictionaries give only as an ordinary noun; but it occurs as a king's name (Hamir-Rāsā in Jour. As. Soc. Beng. xlviii, p. 250).

A-propos of dictionaries, I notice that the verse now re-discovered is cited by Böhtlingk and Roth (s.v. bhoganātha) from Dr. Aufrecht's Oxford Catalogue.

As, however, this subject, which is one of no small bibliographical interest to Sanskritists, has been re-opened, I venture to add two observations.

(1) It is a curious coincidence, at least, that there is extant in Ceylon a Sanskrit medical work, the Bhaishajya-kalpa, attributed to a Māyana Sāyana, who is called "minister" (mantri), and is described as the "crest-gem of the Mahārāja Virapratāpa, who reigned from the Eastern to the Western sea." I have not identified this Virapratāpa; it might be a title of Bukka, of course. The book was partly printed at Colombo in 1886; but I make no apology for quoting a printed book, as the printed Sanskrit literature of Ceylon and South India is practically beyond the reach of most scholars. Whether Sāyana really prescribed for his patron's bodily, as well as his spiritual, health, I cannot of course say; but it would be strange if it should turn out that there is a Ceylon tradition of Sāyana, as there is of Kalidāsa. Let me also note that the form of the name lends some colour to Burnell's suppositions that Māyana is not the real name of Sāyana's father, and that the original form of the name was Sāyana. The Sinhalese often confuse the cerebral and dental nasals.

(2) It remains desirable that in catalogues and bibliographies the works of Sāyana-Mādhava should be entered under one heading, with necessary cross-references. This was the plan adopted by my predecessor, the late Dr. Haas; and in the supplement to his catalogue, which I am now printing for the Trustees of the British Museum, I propose to adhere to it, and to include in the same heading the Pañcadaṣi.

SCIENCE NOTES.

PROF. SCHUSTER will deliver the Bakerian Lecture before the Royal Society on Thursday next, March 20. His subject is "The Discharge of Electricity through Gases."

At the meeting of the Chemical Society, to be held on Thursday next, Prof. Judd will deliver a lecture on "The Evidence afforded by Petrographical Research of the Occurrence of Chemical Change under Great Pressures."

Studies in Evolution and Biology, by Mr. A. Bodington, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

M. BERTILLON, whose anthropometric method of identifying criminals has become an established system in France, will give a lecture on this subject at the Anthropological Institute on April 22. The measurements of a given criminal are compared with those of other convicted persons in the prison registers; and although these records contain the measures of tens of thousands of persons, the comparison is effected with great rapidity. The subject is one of importance not only to prison authorities but to those who are seeking deserters from the army and navy.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

PROF. LOTH, of Rennes, has just published the first volume of a Chrestomathie Bretonne (Breton, Welsh, Cornish). The present volume, after an introduction dealing with Old Celtic, gives specimens of Old, Middle, and Modern Breton, and concludes with a glossarial index.

THE annual report of the Society for the Preservation of the Irish Language shows satisfactory results for the past year. Irish is now taught in forty-five national schools, which "passed" 512 pupils, as compared with 443 in 1888, and 371 in 1889. In intermediate schools 273 "passed" in Celtic, as compared with 210 in the previous year. Among other items we note the following. The standing committee of the Royal University of Ireland has recommended to the senate the appointment of a professor of Irish; Prof. Kuno Meyer is conducting an evening class in Irish at University College, Liverpool; the Rev. Dr. B. MacCarthy has sent to press a new edition of O'Donovan's Grammar; Mr. D. L. Faherty, master of the Calla National School, is collecting the Irish folklore among the people of his neighbourhood.

DR. DANIEL G. BRINTON, professor of American archaeology and linguistics in the University of Pennsylvania, has followed up his paper on "The Ethnologic Affinities of the Ancient Etruscans"—which was summarised in the ACADEMY of December 7, and criticised by Dr. Robert Brown, Jun., in the ACADEMY of December 28, 1889—by a second paper, entitled "Etruscan and Libyan Names." Like the other, it is reprinted from the Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, having been read before that body on February 9. After first suggesting that the Etruscan settlement in Italy may possibly be connected with the defeat of the Libyan invaders of Egypt (among whom "Tursha" are mentioned), by King Menephtah II. circa 1300 B.C. he proceeds to compare the names of divinities, of persons, and of places as preserved in Etruscan and Libyan epigraphy. He also prints a list of Libyan personal names from the Johannis of Corippus, in parallel columns with Etruscan personal names from Corsen. Here is one example of Dr. Brinton's results. The Etruscan word clan, so common on sepulchral inscriptions, and usually interpreted "son," may be regarded as a syncopated form of kel-an. Now, in Libyan, kel means "household," "those dwelling in one tent." Therefore Etruscan clan should be translated "of the family of."

THE forthcoming number of The Babylonian and Oriental Record will contain the following articles: "The Deluge Tradition and its Remains in Ancient China," by Prof. Terrien de Lacouperie; "The Origin and Nature of the Pehlevi," by Prof. O. de Harlez; "Did the Assyrians know the Sexes of Date-palms? No," by Dr. C. Bonavia.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Thursday, February 20.)

DR. SANDYS, president, in the chair.—Mr. Nixon read a note on the force of the gerundive in Liv. Praef. § 6, "quae ante conditam condendam urbem . . . traduntur." Assuming that some word like "facta" or "gesta" must be supplied mentally, he maintained that "facta ante condendam urbem" could not properly be rendered "before the city was in building" (Madvig, Roby, Donaldson, &c.), or "before the beginning of the building," or "before it was contemplated or thought of," as Kühner seemed to take it. Otherwise we should have to admit as possible sentences like "mortuus est Dido ante condendam Romam," or "mortuus est (or conturbavit) adulescens ante soluendam pecuniam," neither of which would be possible without some connexion in the way of intention between some contemplated building or payment and the death or bankruptcy. He considered, therefore, that "facta ante conditam" referred to facts antecedent to, but not necessarily connected with, the building: "facta ante condendam," things done before, and with an ultimate view to, the building, such as the sending of the she-wolf by Mars to suckle Romulus and Remus, the founding of Romulus' asylum, &c. In fact, he maintained that "facta ante condendam" means "facta ante quam urbs conderetur." He did not think it necessary, as Weissenborn did, to look on "condendam" as an afterthought correcting "conditam," as two distinct classes of events might well be referred to; nor did he agree with him in limiting "facta ante condendam" to events which were "bound by fate to happen before the building of the city."—Mr. P. Giles read a paper on "The Latin Pluperfect Subjunctive and Kindred Forms," of which the following is an abstract: Dr. Stolz's Lateinische Grammatik has cleared up many of the difficulties of Latin verb-formation, and set before the general reader the results of the linguistic investigation of many distinguished philologists. But there are few Indo-Germanic languages which present greater difficulties to the philologist than Latin, and no part of Latin grammar is more difficult than the question of the origin of the moods and tenses; hence, after all, a great many forms are still unexplained, or explained in a way which can hardly be regarded as satisfactory. A number of the forms are said, no doubt rightly, to be aorist forms: fuzim, cepim, &c. are optatives of the s-aorist; fazo, cepo, &c. are its subjunctives. But Dr. Stolz evidently despairs of forms like amasso, amassim, prohibessim, ambissim (Lat. Gr. 2 p. 374). Of these he says no more than that they doubtless belong to the aorist. He hardly attempts to explain the forms and why -ss- appears in them. It seems to me that an entirely different theory of the genesis of the Latin pluperfect subjunctive and of these forms will perhaps explain them more satisfactorily. It is universally admitted that the Latin forms in -bam and -bo are composite and not simple forms; why should not legissem, amassem, amassim, &c. be also composite forms? May they not consist of an infinitive, followed by the optative of the substantive verb? The ordinary active infinitive in Latin—vivere, dare, is now admitted to be an old locative; vivere = Skt. loc. jivasi*, not the dative jivasā. But the i-suffix is often not attached to the locative. This happens most frequently in Skt. in -am stems, but Joh. Schmidt has shown that the same thing happens in Greek and Old Bulgarian in the -os stems as well—g, in alēs = alfoi* = alē (Kuhn's Zeitschrift, xxv. 25; xxvii. 306). More recently Schmidt (Pluralbildungen der Indo-G. neutra, p. 305 n) shows that such forms occur also in Sanskrit, as kāhōdas in Rg. Veda i. 65.6. It is not impossible that some forms in Zend which are ordinarily classed as genitives or accusatives may really be locatives without suffix from -os stems (cf. K Z xxviii. 22, 261, 407). Thus there is no difficulty presented by a locative from an -os stem without a locative suffix; and hence leges* may stand alongside legesi*, later legere, and turbās* alongside turbāsi, later turbāre. Is it possible that, as has been suggested to me, these old forms are still preserved in infinitis and suppletis? The form of the second part of the compound -ss- requires a word of explanation. In Vedic Sanskrit there are two forms of the singular of the optative: (1) a monosyllabic form, syām; (2) a dissyllabic form siyām. To syām corresponds the Greek form εἶναι = éyynai (Brugmann, Griechische Grammatik 2 § 12, p. 29), to siyām corresponds the Latin form siem = siyēm. But Latin as well as Sanskrit may have had the shorter form syem*, and this would regularly become sem as syuyō* becomes sud (Stolz 2 § 63, 2, p. 303). Leges = sem becomes legissem, according to the rule that s in a closed syllable becomes i (Stolz 2 § 8, p. 256). Parallels in other languages, if they will not help to prove an hypothesis, will at any rate support the probability of a particular line of development. As it happens, there are exact parallels to this suggested formation of the Latin pluperfect subjunctive in the Baltic branch of the Indo-Germanic family. The Lithuanian and Lettic so-called optative is formed by the combination of an infinitive form (in this case the accusative supine) with the optative of the substantive verb = phiu, as Lith. sikium-bi-me, "we would draw"; kgbotum-bi-tu, "hang you." In Lettic the forms are much more corrupted; and though in the earlier history of the language forms very closely resembling the Lithuanian are found (in Dressel's Litt. Gr., A.D. 1686), the modern forms simply add the personal endings to the supine form. In the same way, for the middle voice the pronoun is added directly to the supine raktū-s, &c. (Bielenstein Lettische Sprache, § 449). This shows that passive forms like turbassitur, and infinitives like impetrasseri, are not necessarily of any great age, and need not even pre-suppose a very early existence for the forms turbassim, turbassum, &c. The meaning of the form is in Lithuanian: (1) that of a genuine present optative; (2) a tentative statement like the Greek optative with ἄν (Schleicher, Litt. Gr. § 107; Korsch, § 1092-3, 1367-8). In Lettic it expresses, besides the optative meaning, an hypothesis the fulfilment of which is improbable or impossible (Bielenstein, §§ 492, 494, 618). The similarity in form and meaning between the Latin and the Baltic formations is thus very striking. On this hypothesis forms like turbassim are easily explained. In the plural the optative had, as usual, the short forms turbas-sim, &c. These were later transferred to the singular, just as in the simple verb sim supplants sem. The forms in -sim in like manner passed over to the plural, so that two complete sets of forms are developed exactly as in verbo and reddo. Dr Stolz's own explanation of staream as originally an aorist indicative—(4) στῆρα-α has seemed to many a hard saying, though phonetically the change is perfectly possible, and the alteration of meaning is not without parallel. To those who doubt, it will perhaps seem more feasible to explain sta-ram, mon-ram, audi-ram, as forms like sta-bam, mon-bam, and the old audi-bam (Stolz, § 113, p. 376). Es-sim would be a root noun in the locative without the i suffix; lego-ram a similar noun with it. This hypothesis also explains the length of the e in the last syllable, for which Stolz and Osthoff have to call in analogy. It seems to me that there are not facts enough to draw a certain conclusion either way. Forms like amasso still present a difficulty. They may be, as Brugmann and Thurneysen suggest, the same as the Celtic s preterite; but, by calling in the rarer Celtic forms to help in the explanation of Latin, the philologist is always in danger of explaining obscurum per obscurius. May there not be here a case of proportional analogy—faxo : fazo = amassim : amasso, to which language furnishes many parallels?—Mr. Giles further suggested the following etymologies: (1) consul. Compare with this Zend hārō, "protector, lord." The corresponding Skt. form āras* does not occur. The Latin equivalent of this would be solos*. Thus con-solos = "joint protector or lord," which gives us the two ideas contained in consul—(a) supreme magistracy, (b) collegiality. Consul = "outside protection, outlaw." Præsul is not connected with these, but with Salii and Salio, the præsul being originally the leader of the Salii. (2) culpa. culpa = "fault," and hence the original form would have been kūpa. Op. with this Skt. kṛpana, "Elend" (Grassmann), Zend xrapstra, "wicked" (applied to heretics). The original and more concrete meaning is, perhaps, preserved in the Lithuanian kliptūti, "mit schiefen Füßen halbblau gehen" (Korsch). (3) uallis, ἄλῆς (Fälis). These words, perhaps, come from a root vēn or vem. If vēn, uallis comes easily, cf. vānus from vā*. As in the Elean dialect v appears as ā there is no difficulty in any case. The assimilation to the suffix -li-s would be parallel to στῆλα, Ionic-Attic στῆλη from στῆλλα (Meyer, Gr. Gr., § 65). Skt. vanam, "wood," is from the same root=vem-o-m, and so also Lat. venor, "præstare the woodland craft." Vēna-frum is like the Skt. vanam. In Zend vanam means "a tree." For this change of meaning compare English holt with German holz; Eng. wood with O.Ir. ad, "tree"; O.H.G. witu "holz." For the change of meaning in Latin venor of Lithuanian medis, genitive medžio, "tree," but medžiūklis, "the hunt," medžiūju, "I hunt." (4) Raudus, rūdis, rūdis. (a) Festus says rudus vel raudus significat rom rudem et imperfectum. nam saxum quoque raudus appellatur postea . . . in assimilatione temoria ass infecum rudus appellatur. The popular etymology connecting it with rūdis affects its later meaning.

Raudus meant originally "a huge mass" (rūdis is the popular form, cf. Clodius and Claudius), and is the same as the Skt. rūdas* only used in the dual rūdau, "the two worlds, heaven and earth." The word is made feminine by being personified into the wife of Rudra, cf. Latin Venus, originally neuter. (b) rūdis, more frequently plural rūdera, is exactly the same in form and meaning as Skt. rūdhas "(1) Wall, Schützwehr, (2) Steiler Abhang" (Grassmann); both go back to a form rūdhas*, Skt. rūdā* = "shut in, hinder." (c) rūdis is from another root, Skt. rūdh, "wachsen, spriessen" (Grassmann). Hence rūdis, like the German Sprossling, (1) is used = "rod, switch, shoot of a tree," and (2) becomes adjectival = "immature, not full grown." These forms, along with gaudio = γῆδός, &c., show that Brugmann's statement that original dh in the middle of a word before and after r, before l, and after u and v becomes h (Grundriss i. § 370), requires limitation to cases where r and l appear. (5) ῥῥῶ, ῥῥῶ, ῥῥῶ. ῥῥῶ = Skt. vāhas, explained by Sāyana in three out of the five instances in Rig-Veda as stōtra, "hymn of praise." With this another vāhas = δυσχερής was confused. Ebeling (Hom. Wörb) shows that the Greek words had F. To the same root belong Lat. uāgio, uāgius, &c. (6) ῥῥῶ, ῥῥῶ. From the same root, with another suffix, as Skt. vīras, Lith. vīras, Lat. vir, &c. This seems more probable than Brugmann's derivation (Curt. Studium iv., l. 155). The form with s is probably a hyper-Dorism, as ῥῥῶ occurs (Herodotus ix. 85). The word was applied to the men between twenty and thirty years of age. As Plutarch and Hesychius are the principal authorities for the compounds, it is not surprising that F has disappeared. The old connexion with ῥῥῶ, ῥῥῶ (hence "those who might speak in the assembly") has two difficulties—(a) only Spartans over thirty years of age were admitted to the assembly, and (b) none but officials were allowed to speak in it.

CLIFTON SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, February 22.)

W. O. H. Cross, Esq., in the chair.—Miss Florence Herapath read a "Time-Analysis of 'Philastr,'" showing that the action of the play required four dramatic days, with intervals of uncertain length between Acts II. and III., and between Acts IV. and V.—Mr. Leo H. Grindon, in a paper on "The Figurative Language of 'Philastr,'" was inclined to think that the play should be attributed to Beaumont solely. He urged that the figurative language, though opposite and timely, yet scarcely removed from the trite, would show that for imagery, founded upon natural phenomena and occurrences, Beaumont was much more indebted to books and to hearsay than to personal observation. In this we have a very marked difference from Shakspeare, nine-tenths of whose best is a record, in reality, of his own experience. But, of course, we do not ask the author of "Philastr" for what he never had the chance of acquiring, owing to his not being familiar with country life. Most of the similes are the most ancient of figures; but many, being really good, though old, never become antiquated, and perhaps it is man's duty to pass them on. The figurative language of "Philastr," though suitable and expressive, is of the kind ordinarily termed "stock." The author discloses little or none of that delectable command of the analogies and harmonies of nature which, according to Plato, is the characteristic of exalted genius. He gives us nothing very different from his predecessors. The reader is never struck by the subtlety or the poetic richness of an image met with for the first time. He moves as through the galleries of a mansion, where there is plenty to entertain, and where the company, if not lofty-minded, gives him much, in the way of incident, to note and reflect upon. But the pictures upon the walls, and any music he may catch the sound of, offer no novelty and convey no new inspiration. The visit may be a pleasant one, notwithstanding.—Mr. John Taylor, in "A Few Notes on 'Philastr,'" said that the coarseness, of which we find examples in most of the Elizabethan plays is not intended by the writers to interact, as in modern instances, on the reader or spectator, but simply to raise a laugh. Nor do we find in Elizabethan literature in general that systematic pandering to lubricity which is so deadly to all righteousness in the godless aestheticism of the modern school. Defiling of souls, disorder in marriage, and shameless uncleanness are not presented to be imitated, but to be avoided. Though the vagabonds of the earlier plays may trespass on the purlieus of virtue for spoliation's sake, there is no graceless design on the part of the authors to level the ramparts between good and evil. There is a pagan and mythological figurativeness in the Elizabethan drama; but the loutish and lumpy bestiality of a Corydon, and the insolent abasement of human nature to its lowest sensual cravings, are only exhibited in contrast with the higher forms of the same nature. It can also be shown that, in the play under consideration, although mention is made of church, altar, penance, pilgrimage, prayers, and dropping of beads, the whole play is a piece of paganism, as confessedly fatalistic as any Greek drama in the unwinding of its plot.

ARISTOTELIAN SOCIETY.—(Monday, March 3)

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. G. F. Stout read a paper on "Association Controversies." He criticised, at some length, the theory of association by similarity and association by contiguity, advocated by Bain, and also the theory of identity, advocated by Steinthal, Ward, and Bradley, which he considered was to be preferred to it, but still inadequate. The real parting of the ways which lead respectively in the direction of routine and of creative construction is not to be found in the distinction between association by similarity and by contiguity, but in the distinction between what he called relative and simple suggestion. The explanation of the flow of ideas given by English associationists is utterly inadequate, because it neglects the Herbartian doctrine of apperception.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

FINE ART.

THE PAINTER-ETCHERS.

THE etched work of Rembrandt—the greatest, without question, ever done in the world—has fortunately been seen by the real student so often that it is unnecessary in the pages of the ACADEMY to do much more than name the fact that what is roughly speaking about one-third of it lies open to inspection at the exhibition of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers. The prints belong to Mr. Seymour Haden, the society's president; and he has arranged them as nearly as may be in order of production. And, though the serious student of etching will not need to require that more shall be said than I have just now indicated as to the virtues or characteristics of the great classic of the art—a master whose work has long been charged with authority—a double purpose is yet served by the display of Mr. Haden's collection of Rembrandts: first, the public itself is likely to discover some attractiveness in the very announcement of such a display; and second, the young etcher, the incomplete etcher, or this would-be etcher, is likely to find, upon the wall of Rembrandt's silent reproof for extravagance, for conventionality, for merely mechanical labour, for mere prettiness, and silent encouragement to the practice of an art which shall combine learning with ease, and flexibility with style.

In the gallery of the Painter-Etchers the lover of the masters will be drawn pretty soon to an examination of the work of three of the younger men—Mr. Strang, Mr. Frank Short, and Mr. O. J. Watson. Each of these artists make to the exhibition a contribution of an ample kind. Mr. Strang, it is possible, is represented even more variously—as to theme—than he was represented last year, though we cannot assert that in the course of a single twelve-month there is any marked technical progress; nor do we feel sure that Mr. Strang desires that there should be—so pre-occupied is he with what he presents that life is hardly long enough to permit him to be quite equally busy with the question of how he presents it. Intensity, we think, is his chief characteristic, and a certain naïveté, by no means incompatible with humour. In art, he has studied especially Rembrandt and Legros; and in life, the poor of London. Hence—not to speak of him, on the present occasion, with greater detail—the plates of “The Salvation Army” (No. 261)—in which the spiritual and the hideous are strangely and subtly wedded—“The End,” a half-grotesque but powerful tragedy (No. 249); “A Soup Kitchen” (No. 52), which, with a great deal of Mr. Strang’s own, recalls a little also a Legros of ten years since, “Le Repas des Pauvres”; and—to make an end, before the number of interesting prints is, by any means, exhausted—“The Preacher” (No. 275), with its Knox-like earnestness and narrowness, and its touches of admirable humour.

Mr. Frank Short exhibits in several mediums—in mezzotint, in aquatint, and in pure line. To the daintiness and precision and freedom of his art, it has often already been a pleasure to bear witness. Roughly speaking, his Cornish etchings, though good, are not so admirable as those to which he was prompted by his enjoyment of the flat landscape of Rye. With the remark that in one or two instances the boat-drawing (in which Mr. Whistler excels) seems to us a little wanting in subtlety, we shall pass them by, to concentrate ourselves on that which is entirely admirable. In that class we put one aquatint, two pure etchings, and a drypoint. The aquatint is “Rye Pier” (No. 47). Nothing could be more daintily gradated; nothing could be more poetic and more serene. The etchings are “Low Tide: the Evening Star” (No. 97) and “Rye Port” (No. 304)—both of them as engaging instances as it is possible to see of the pleasure with which this artist’s eye follows the line of a delicate distance and remote horizon. The drypoint is No. 20. It is called—what, indeed, it truly represents—“A Wintry Blast on the Stourbridge Canal.” In its intended dreariness it is one with a print which Mr. Short has previously shown, “The Nail Makers.” Both of these are part, we understand, of the execution of a scheme for recording certain features of the district which abuts upon—nay, is almost a portion of—the Black Country. The work of Mr. C. J. Watson is not as obviously charged with feeling as that of Mr. Short, and it makes no pretence to the intensity which is the note of Mr. Strang; but it is often quite admirable in its selection of line, in firmness, in frankness, and in purely technical skill. One or two Dutch subjects are very good; but the thing among Mr. Watson’s contributions which appears to us to have the fullest unity, the greatest simplicity, and to be the most without fault, is the plate entitled “Bosham Mill Bridge” (No. 2). What it shows is the small bridge over that which is presumably a very small channel. Behind it, certain masts of almost unseen coasting boats rise against the sky, and there is the suggestion of a great flat land—of a wide though a just now invisible distance. But “Campden, Gloucestershire” (No. 13) is hardly less excellent, and is quite as immediately engaging.

Time and space compel us to indicate within narrower limits the remaining work to which it is essential to call attention. Among etchings of the more elaborate kind—of the kind at least in which not very much is left to the imagination of the spectator—Mr. Edward Slocombe’s deserve notice. His “Grande Place, Antwerp,” is the most considerable, and it is by no means the least spirited of his works. Mr. David Law’s “Richmond Castle, Yorkshire”

(No. 74)—a favourite subject with Turner, who painted the northern Richmond at least thrice—is an exceedingly elaborate and painstaking, and, to many, a very attractive rendering of picturesque form and of atmospheric effect. It would be foolish to deny its merit. And similarly, whether one likes or does not like the special method in which Mr. Axel Haig addresses himself to his work—that work, a laboured transcript of a particular place, rather than a swift suggestion of it—it would be ungracious and unfair to emphasise only that which may be unwelcome in a plate so assuredly clever—not to say impressive—as “The Transcript of Burgos Cathedral” (No. 16). Indeed, a measure of freedom greater than that which Mr. Haig is wont to employ displays itself in this print. The splendid hammered iron-screen is treated by Mr. Haig with exceeding skill. Mr. Charles Robertson has works which approve themselves to the public—“the small plate,” as he calls it, of “Dover” (No. 44) is a very favourable example of his art. Mr. Wilfred Ball’s “After Sundown, Venice” (No. 12), is a pretty and dainty etching. Mr. Mortimer Menpes sends several Thames prints, which we do not notice further, because they have been seen before. It is London, too—and sometimes London below bridge—that has interested Mr. Herbert Marshall. Mr. Farrer’s best subject is “Pensive Evening” (No. 109), and his work here is essentially poetic in feeling. Mr. May has some good frank sketches. Mr. Dalgleish’s little figures and Mrs. Merritt’s portrait of Mr. Leslie Stephen are worth looking at with care. Colonel Goff, Mr. Francis Walker, and certainly Mr. Percy Thomas are in their different ways delicate and refined. Elaboration—which they do not seek—cannot go further than in Mr. C. W. Sherborn’s book-plates, of which the best—and it is indeed excellent—seems to us to be that whose impressions rest within the covers of the volumes of the fortunate Mr. Frederick Stibbert.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

LETTER FROM EGYPT.

Luxor: February 23, 1890.

SHORTLY after the date of my last letter I paid a visit to the Island of Sehel, midway between Assuan and Philæ, where Mr. Wilbour was employed in copying two inscriptions of considerable historical importance.

The southern end of this island, as is well known, is a perfect treasure-house of hieroglyphic texts, incised upon the granite rocks and boulders. The island was, from early times, the sanctuary of the deities of the Cataract, before its holiness and fame were superseded by the later attractions of Philæ. Most of the inscriptions face a ravine in the south-western part of the island; and, led by this clue, we discovered the site of the ancient shrine, the central object of pilgrimage to the pious Egyptian of Pharaonic days. Fragments of the sandstone naos are still lying on the ground among the débris of the old sanctuary. By the side of them is a stele of the age of Thothmes III., still perfect; and at what was once the back of the chapel is a long inscription, accompanied by sculptures, apparently of the Ptolemaic period. In the neighbouring village of Sehel I found stones which had come from the ruined sanctuary, and bore the cartouches of Ptolemy Philopator, showing that the shrine had been repaired or enlarged in his reign. I also copied a stele of the same epoch, which had been built into the wall of a native house. The conversation which followed the completion of my task was characteristic. Bakshish being demanded, I asked to whom the house belonged? “Gadfar,” was the reply. “Where is Gadfar?” “He is dead.” “How can I give bakshish to a dead man?” I enquired; and the logic of the argument was accepted as irresistible.

North of Sehel, on the western bank of the river, I discovered the site of another sanctuary. It is marked by a large boulder of granite, which commands an extensive view, and is close to a modern Sheikh’s tomb. The latter is about a couple of miles south of the Qubbet el-Hawa, underneath which Sir Francis Grenfell disinterred a series of ancient tombs. The rock is covered with hieroglyphic invocations to Khnum, Sati, and Anq, the deities of the Cataract; and the remains of a chapel of sandstone lie round about it. Among these are a broken stele, which mentions “the land of ebony,” and a seated statue in a barbaric style of art, which has on the back an inscription in unknown characters.

An old road leads westward from the sanctuary to some quarries, where I found the remains of tombs of the Roman period. The dead were buried under the shelter of the rock in rectangular coffins of terra-cotta, which resemble troughs with lids. A cairn of loose stones was piled over them, surrounded with a circle of stones. In some instances I found the name of the defunct cut in the rock above the tomb. Almost all the names are Greek or Latin, like Sokrates and Marius, though the names of the fathers are Egyptian.

One of the pilgrims to the sanctuary was a certain scribe and captain of the archers, named Thoth-m-hib. The same individual has left a memorial of himself in Sehel; and I discovered another very curious record of him on a rock in the western desert, about three miles to the north of Assuan. Here he describes himself as “divine prophet of the temple of Pa-Khnum.” The inscription is accompanied by a drawing of five magnificently equipped dahabiahs, and a sort of small boat below them. Five men are rowing the foremost dahabiah, above which Thoth-m-hib is represented as walking with a crooked stick in his hand, an Assyrian cap on his head, and a strange kind of cape over his shoulders, while a naked slave follows with an umbrella, and a dog runs by his side. A giraffe is standing in one of the dahabiahs. Two hippopotamus are depicted on one side of the inscription, and two ostriches on the other, a long-horned gazelle being above them. The position of the ostriches seems to indicate that they were found in the locality at the time, though the giraffe was being imported from some district further south.

Unfortunately it is impossible to fix the date of Thoth-m-hib; but on the summit of a cliff on the western bank of the river a little to the north of Kom Ombo, we found a similar graffito in honour of the prefect Rakh-mâ-R., whose tomb at Thebes is familiar to Egyptian tourists. Here the inscription is accompanied by the delineation of a donkey, of a dog pursuing a long-horned gazelle, of another dog facing a gazelle, of a man leading a horse, and of a boat or dahabiah. Opposite the cliff are some quarries, where we discovered the cartouches of Apries carved in large size on the rocky wall. Not far off is a tablet with a Coptic inscription in fifteen lines with a Kufic text underneath, the letters of which are in relief. There are a few hieroglyphic graffiti in the neighbourhood, and the words “Alkimios, the twelfth year,” in Greek characters.

Mr. Greville Chester had informed me that inscriptions were to be found on a line of rocks on the western bank south of Heshân, and about four or five miles north of Silsilia. We accordingly spent a day examining them. They were especially plentiful at the corner of a wadi, which seems to be nameless. Besides hieroglyphic and hieratic graffiti, I copied a large number of Greek inscriptions, some dated in the reign of “Ptolemy, the son of Ptolemy, and Queen Bereniké," while a few belonged to a pre-Alexandrian age. As the writers describe themselves as paying "a vow," it would appear that the place was accounted sacred. One of the inscriptions, dated in "the second year," states that Artapates—whose name reveals his Persian origin—had been appointed stratēgos or general. The most important part of my discovery, however, consisted of six Phoenician inscriptions, the authors of which offered their prayers to Isis, Horus, and Khnum. One of the names occurring in them is Abed-Nebo, the prototype of the Abed-Nego of the book of Daniel. The rarity of Phoenician inscriptions in Egypt adds an interest to this discovery. Besides the Phoenician inscriptions, I also came across a short Karian grafito, and a twice-repeated Kypriote text. On one occasion the latter was accompanied by what look like Hittite hieroglyphs. Can it be a bilingual?

The inscriptions are accompanied by multitudes of animals and birds, some of which are drawn with considerable skill. Men and boats also occur frequently; and the drawings are found not only on the rocks near the river, but also inland in the wadis. The drawings are of all ages. As we have seen, the inscription of Rekh-mâ-Ra shows that some must belong to the time of the XVIIIth Dynasty, while others are evidently of very recent origin. But I have convinced myself that Mr. Petrie is right in holding that many of them go back to a prehistoric epoch before the introduction of writing. The weathering they have undergone would alone show this. On the famous inscribed rock of El Qab, for instance, there are drawings of animals by the side of which the accompanying hieroglyphic texts of the VIth Dynasty look quite modern. Above Heshân, again, the animals most commonly represented are the giraffe, long-horned gazelle, and ostrich, the hippopotamus, elephant, and ox occurring more rarely. Though the gazelle is still found in the neighbourhood, the presence of the giraffe implies wooded plains in place of the arid desert which during the historical epoch has extended almost to the water's edge from Edfu southwards, while the absence of the ostrich from the hieroglyphic syllabary indicates that it had become extinct in Egypt when the latter was formed. The earlier drawings have reminded me forcibly of the Bushman paintings on rocks now in the possession of Miss Lloyd. The animals are drawn with the same degree of spirit and in similar attitudes, the delineation of the human figure being in both cases immeasurably inferior. It is well known that the Bushman race once extended further to the north than is now the case, while history shows us the Egyptians pushing the native races further and further towards the south. The drawings on the rocks seem to be connected with the cairns and circles of stones which cover the summits of the cliffs from the neighbourhood of Heshân southward. These "rude stone monuments" deserve a careful examination. Major Ross has found worked flints in the great desert behind Kom Ombo at the foot of the mountains, and Mr. Petrie picked up a water-rolled palaeolith on the hills behind Edfu.

At Esneh I found the base of a granite column with the cartouche of Ramses II., now used for mooring purposes. As it has come from one of the two temples which once stood at Esneh, we may see in it an evidence that Ramses II. was a builder here as in other places in Egypt.

By way of a conclusion to my letter I must draw attention to an ostrakon from Karnak which I have acquired, and which is unlike any other I have ever seen. The text upon it runs as follows: "O my lord Isidoros, come and bring me the commentaries (Agēas) on the first book of the Iliad for which I have asked you." The potsherd has survived, but where is the manuscript to which it refers?

A. H. SAYCE.

Luxor: Feb. 26, 1890.

P.S.—I feel myself obliged to add a postscript to my last letter, as since posting it I have made a discovery of too great an importance for Egyptian archaeology not to be made public at once. The tomb and mummy of Amenophis IV., the "Heretic King" of Egyptian history, have been found at Tel el-Amarna. It is from thence that the cuneiform tablets about which so much has lately been written have really come, not from the place falsely indicated to me and others as the locality in which they were found. The tomb has proved a second pit of Dêr el-Bahari to the antiquity-dealers of Ekhmim, by whom it has been worked. Now that it has been despoiled of the precious objects it once contained, they have condescended to inform us of its exact position. On my way down the Nile I hope to visit it, and see if the inscriptions upon its walls are still serviceable for science.

The mummy of the king has, unfortunately, been torn to pieces. The fragments of a royal mummy which were offered for sale at Luxor two years ago were derived, not from the opposite cliffs of Thebes, but from the capital of the Heretic King. The beautiful objects of ivory and alabaster which have lately been in the market of "antikas," the bronze rings and enamelled porcelain which bear the cartouches of Amenophis IV. and the solar disk, the delicate glass and bracelets of solid gold which have been offered for sale to travellers, have all come from the desecrated sepulchre. The discovery, unfortunately, took place at a time when an attempt was again being made to put in force the law against the sale and exportation of antiquities—with the inevitable result that the discovery was concealed, the objects found were dissipated, broken, or hidden away, and information invaluable to the historical student irretrievably lost. When will it be understood that, whatever may be the advantage of protection in commerce, free trade in antiquities is indispensable for archaeological science?

More than one mummy has been found, and the discovery of the royal tomb has, I am told, led to the discovery of others. We shall see.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

WE are now in what may be called the thick of the spring exhibitions. No less than seven open next week: the thirty-ninth annual exhibition of pictures by continental artists (including works by Profs. von Uhde and Liebermann) at the French Gallery in Pall Mall; the twenty-sixth annual exhibition of cabinet pictures by British and foreign artists, at McLean's Gallery, in the Haymarket; Messrs. Tooth & Son's exhibition next door, where may be seen Joanowitz's latest work, "The Story of a Battle"; sketches of London, by Mr. Herbert Marshall, at the Fine Art Society's; a collection mainly of French pictures, at Messrs. Dowdeswell's; a series of water-colour drawings, by Mr. E. Wake Cook, entitled "Two Years' Work in the Sunny South," at Messrs. Vokins', in Great Portland Street; and a painting of the House of Commons steeplechase of last year, by Mr. G. D. Giles, at Mr. Mendoza's, in King Street, St. James's.

THE Society of Antiquaries has resolved to raise a research fund, the interest of which shall from time to time be applied towards the expense of excavations—such as those formerly carried on at Silchester and Wroxeter—or in such other modes of advancing knowledge as the council may think fit. A total capital sum of £3000 is asked for, of which £1750 has already been promised.

IT is stated that Mr. Henry Tate, of Streat-ham, has offered to present to the National Gallery about sixty modern pictures of the British School, on the condition that they should be housed without unnecessary delay in Trafalgar Square. The donation, which is of the total estimated value of nearly £90,000, includes Sir J. E. Millais's "The North-West Passage" and "The Knight Errant," as well as several fine examples of Mr. Alma Tadema, Mr. Orchardson, Mr. Hook, Mr. J. B. Davis, &c., Crome, Constable, and Linnell are also represented, as also some of the most promising of our younger artists.

IN his paper, read at the Society of Arts this week, Mr. James Orrock made more than one practical suggestion for the ampler representation of British art in the National Gallery. Without presuming to interfere with the exercise by the director and trustees of their discretion in the expenditure of the annual allowance, he suggested that bequests (unless express provision were made to the contrary) should be considered as intended for the purchase of works of our national school. And in lamenting the inferior rank somewhat stupidly assigned by the academic mind in England to the art of the water-colour painter, Mr. Orrock urged that the display of the Henderson bequest of Dewints and Cattermoles in a more prominent and better lighted apartment than they now occupy would tend to encourage a truer appreciation of water-colour art, and even the bestowal upon the nation hereafter of further examples of the masters of a practice in which the English are easily first.

THE fourth annual conference of the Camera Club will be held on Thursday and Friday next, in the theatre of the Society of Arts, under the presidency of Capt. W. de W. Abney. Apparatus, pictures, and lantern slides will be exhibited; and several important papers will be read by Lord Rayleigh, Capt. Abney, Mr. T. R. Dallmeyer, and others.

ON Tuesday next there will be sold at Christie's the valuable series of sale catalogues (mostly priced and noted) formed by Mr. George Redford; and also the art libraries of Mr. Redford and the lately deceased engraver, Thomas Oldham Barlow.

At a special meeting at the London Institution, on Friday next, March 21, at 8 p.m., Mr. G. Collingwood will read a paper on "Ruskin and Reynolds: their Theories of Art."

At the meeting of the Aristotelian Society on Monday next, March 17, there will be a Symposium on the question of the relation of the fine arts to one another, in which Mr. B. Bosanquet, Mr. E. W. Cook, and Mr. D. G. Ritchie are to take part.

MESSRS. BOUSSOD, VALADON & Co., of the Goupil Gallery, have been appointed fine art publishers to the Queen.

THE STAGE.

"HAMLET" AT THE GLOBE.

THE performance of "Hamlet" at the Globe Theatre does not meet with much favour from criticism; and it is notorious that, while it is not an easy thing to make a great success in "Hamlet"—we mean in the principal part—it is quite difficult to actually fail in it. So rich are the opportunities, so sustained the interest, so willing is the public generally to be pleased with that which is essayed! And the present performance, all round, need not be described as a failure. Mr. Benson's own performance seems moderately creditable. It appears even to aim to be ingenious; but the ingenuity of it is within but narrow limits. Has Mr. Benson the gifts that are absolutely necessary for the higher interpretation of the part? Has he poetry, imagination, grace, ease, and sense of rhythm? Well-disposed as we were to him from his performance in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," we doubt much if there is revealed in him the great tragic actor of the future. Is he not, rather, a university man who has taken pains?—one who is more or less of a scholar, and who labours, most praiseworthy, to be an artist? Mrs. Benson plays Ophelia; and her appearance in the part is, we fear, but another instance of the assertion of the principle of domesticity upon the stage.

The actor who represents the King does indeed little, actively, to recall Mr. Willard; but we cannot pay him the compliment of asserting that he does much to make us forget him. Mr. Phillips—destined, I am told, to be known in another art than that of the theatre—displays intelligence as the Ghost; and Mr. Weir knows how to play the First Gravedigger; Miss Ada Ferrers is a handsome Queen; and there can be nothing but praise for Mr. Benson's intelligence in casting for the part an actress who will at least sustain the theory for which Mr. Wilson Barrett must have the first credit—he it was who asserted, at the Princess's, that Hamlet's mother could not have passed the age of possible comeliness.

STAGE NOTES.

MR. BEERBOHM TREE will go on a provincial tour during the vacation at the Haymarket. It is now ten years, we are reminded, since Mr. Tree last travelled in the provinces. He was then very little known.

WE are glad to hear that Mr. Irving's next production at the Lyceum will be a new poetic play by Mr. Hermann Merivale.

MR. HERMANN VEZIN, supported by Miss Olive Stettith, has lately been repeating at the Grand Theatre, Islington, his fine performance in Mr. Will's "Man o' Airie." Mr. Vezin has likewise appeared, at the same theatre, as Shylock.

THERE will be no part for Miss Julia Neilson in Mr. Sydney Grundy's new play at the Haymarket; but the lady is engaged, we hear, for Mr. Buchanan's piece which is to follow Mr. Grundy's. Mr. Fernandez will, it is understood, be seen in the first production.

MR. AND MRS. ERNEST PERTWEE announce a dramatic and vocal recital, next Wednesday afternoon, at the Steinway Hall. Mr. Pertwee's dramatic recitations are allowed to be those of a graceful elocutionist, with a strong sense of humour and of pathos; while as a singer, and a teacher of her art of singing, Mrs. Pertwee deservedly takes high rank.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MR. HAMISH MACCUNN'S Cantata, "Bonny Kilmeny" (op. 2) was performed last Saturday at the Crystal Palace under the direction of Mr. Manns. The opera number shows that this was an early effort of the composer's. In reviewing the vocal score about a twelvemonth ago, we referred to the clear form and melodic charm of the work, and can now add that the orchestration in places is highly effective. But the succession of quiet movements in the opening part of the work is scarcely satisfactory, while the epilogue—the words from a poem by Dr. Moir—forms an anti-climax. The libretto, telling the story of the beautiful maiden Kilmeny, is based upon James Hogg's "Queen's Wake."

The most pleasing numbers of the Cantata are the tenor solo, "Her brow was like the lily flower," and the soprano solo, "I have come from the land of love and night." The vocalists were Mme. A. Larkoom, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Norman Salmond, who all sang well. The Crystal Palace choir did fair justice to the choruses. The work, which takes an hour in performance, was well received. Mr. MacCunn was called to the platform. The Cantata was preceded by the same composer's clever Overture, "Land of the Mountain and the Flood." The unfinished Symphony in B minor of Schubert's was splendidly played, and the concert ended with the closing scene for soli, chorus, and orchestra, from "Die Meistersinger."

The Royal College pupils gave an orchestral concert at the Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on Monday evening. The members of the band, under Dr. Stanford's direction, gave a very good account of themselves in Dr. Mackenzie's interesting Ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (op. 29). Miss P. Fletcher played Brahms' difficult and ungrateful Concerto in B flat (op. 83) with considerable skill, but excessive energy. Of the four movements the Andante is charming, and the Hungarian Finale is bright; but the first two are dry. It was scarcely the right work for a scholar. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Forster, sang two well-written Madrigals, by Lillian Blair-Oliphant (ex-student) and Godfrey Pringle (exhibitioner). The former was the more effective of the two. The programme included a Scene from a MS. Opera by G. Pringle.

This, however, we were unable to hear, as a performance of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins, interpreted by Mme. Néruda and Dr. Joachim at the Monday Popular Concerts, tempted us across the road to St. James's Hall. One might travel round the globe, but nowhere could a finer interpretation of the old master's work be heard. The executants were recalled at the close, and repeated the Largo. Mdlle. Janotha, the pianist, gave such satisfaction with the Chopin Polonaise in F sharp minor that she returned to the platform and played the Chopin Funeral March. Mme. de Swiatlowsky's fine, well-trained mezzo-soprano voice was heard to advantage in a Handel Aria from "Rodelinda," and in a song by Dargomijaky.

A concert was given by Mdlle. Janotha at St. James's Hall on Tuesday for the Arabella Goddard Testimonial Fund. Into the reasons why a pianist who at one time occupied a prominent public position should require help we do not propose to inquire. One thing seems clear: Mme. Arabella Goddard is in want; and, from a letter written by her, she is most thankful to Mdlle. Janotha for all the trouble she has taken on her behalf. The concert itself may be briefly described. Beethoven's Triple Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, with orchestra, was performed by the concert-giver with the able assistance of Dr. Joachim and Signor Piatti. The work is somewhat of a curiosity. It was last given, we believe, in 1882 by Sir C. Hallé, at one of his Symphony Concerts. One cannot fail to recognise the hand of Beethoven, but it is little more than a pièce d'occasion. The three soloists played exceedingly well. The concert opened with Henschel's "La Gondoliera," charmingly sung by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. Songs were contributed by Mmes. Redeker-Semon, Mary Davies, Antoinette Stirling, and Patey, and Miss Liza Lehmann. Mdlle. Janotha played a Clara Schumann Romance, a Gavotte of her own, and, for an encore, Beethoven's variations on "God save the King." The Royal Amateur Orchestra, of which the string department is excellent, was under the direction of Mr. George Mount. Mr. Frantzen was the accompanist. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 933.
[New Issue.]

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1890.

PRIME 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

THE ADVENTURE SERIES.

Large crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s. each.

Under this title Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish a Collection of the Lives of Men and Women remarkable for adventurous careers. Thus to the English fireside will be introduced Adventurers of all Countries—Travellers, Seamen, and Soldiers, Buccaneers of Note, and Famous Robbers, Prisoners who have escaped from Captivity, and those who, banded together, have passed through danger and difficulty. That the reader may be better acquainted with his new acquaintances, preference will be given, where possible, to autobiographies over compilations. The volumes will average 400 pp., and will be fully illustrated.

THE FIRST VOLUME, NOW READY, IS ENTITLED

THE ADVENTURES OF A YOUNGER SON.

By E. J. TRELAWNY.

With an Introduction by EDWARD GARNETT.

ILLUSTRATED WITH SEVERAL PORTRAITS OF TRELAWNY, AND AN AUTOGRAPH LETTER.
IN PREPARATION.

II.

IV.

PELLOW'S ADVENTURES AND SUFFERINGS DURING HIS TWENTY-THREE YEARS' CAPTIVITY IN MOROCCO.

Edited, with Prefatory Notes, by Dr. ROBERT BROWN.

* * Other Volumes will follow at short intervals.

NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

ITALIAN CHARACTERS in the EPOCH of UNIFICATION.

By the Countess MARTINENGO. This Work contains the Lives of Bettino Ricasoli, Constance d'Aeglio, Ugo Bassi, Daniel Manin, the Cairoli, Luigi Settembrini, the Poerios, and many others.

"The strongly marked variations in the characters of these men and women, contrasting as it does with their singular unity of purpose and action, imparts a stronger and more sustained interest to the book than usually attaches to a collection of essays. The papers are written with insight into the sources of recent Italian history, and will be read with pleasure and profit by all who are interested in that subject."—Scotsman.
"This volume contains a set of vivid sketches of some of the purest of Italian patriots."—Observer.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

GOD in SHAKESPEARE: the Poet and the World's Renaissance. By "OLELIA."

"He possesses a knowledge of Shakspeare unrivalled except by ... On every page there is evidence of rare energy and still rarer subtlety."—Glasgow Herald.
"A man of original and subtle mind... The astonished reader who perseveres long enough to become sympathetic with the author's style and method may be led with fearful pleasure."—Graphic.

Now ready, fcap. 8vo, cloth, 8s. 6d.

HEROES and MARTYRS, and other Poems. By John ALFRED LANGFORD, LL.D.

Now Ready, the TWENTY-THIRD VOLUME of "The STORY of the NATIONS."

RUSSIA.

By W. R. MORFILL, M.A., Reader to the University of Oxford in the Russian and other Slavonic Tongues.

Illustrations and Maps. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

"Mr. Morfill has some eminent qualifications for the task he has undertaken—a thorough knowledge of Slavonic languages and literatures, a sufficient training in critical methods, and an interest in current European politics which is active and yet not biased by party partisanship... He has produced a book which does credit to his industry and care, for it evidently represents a minute and intelligent study of the most recent native writers, as well as considerable acquaintance with the old chroniclers."—Speaker.
"Well arranged... Set forth with clearness and directness."—Saturday Review.
"One of the most serviceable of the series."—Scots Observer.

IN PREPARATION.

THE TRIALS OF A COUNTRY PARSON.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

RUSSIA AND THE SIBERIAN EXILES.

The Eighteen Numbers of THE CENTURY MAGAZINE containing Mr. GEORGE KENNAN'S Articles on SIBERIA may still be had, price 20s.

THE SPEAKER, of March 15, reviewing the German translation, says:—

"The speedy publication in Berlin of a cheap translation of Mr. Kennan's book on Siberia, or rather of its first ten chapters, is a witness to the strong feeling which exists in Germany against the present Russian Government, and to some extent, it is to be feared, against Russia as a European Power. The translator gives in his preface the wish to bring German opinion to bear on the Czardom as the motive for undertaking the work, with a view to 'bettering the lot of our unhappy Russian brethren,' but intimates the small hope entertained in Germany that the administration will be moved thereby."

THOS. de QUINCEY, UNCOLLECTED

WRITINGS of. With Preface and Annotations by JAMES HOGG. 2 vols., each of 350 pages, with Portraits, 12s.

Mr. Hogg, who was intimately associated with De Quincey from the beginning of 1850 until his death in December, 1859, has here collected together a considerable number of his writings, originally contributed to various magazines, some of which has hitherto appeared in any English edition of De Quincey's complete works. Every piece is duly authenticated, and in an interesting preface the Editor gives the evidence which establishes its authenticity. As a recent reviewer in the Pall Mall Gazette observes:—"There are many differences of opinion as to the works of De Quincey that will live. Those who would narrow the list have, we think, a very inadequate notion of their worth. As a master of style alone he is entitled to rank among the 'Immortals.' It is true that nearly all the products of his pen appeared originally in the pages of serials; but there were giants among magazine contributors in those days, and De Quincey was one of them."

LITERATURE.

Fabian Essays in Socialism. Edited by G. Bernard Shaw. (The Fabian Society, 63, Fleet Street.)

SOCIALISM has been so much talked about, so much written about, and yet so little understood, that we turn in no hopeful frame of mind to any novel work on the subject. We do not, of course, know whether we are to expect the childish faith which delights in building up a utopian commonwealth, the slashing but somewhat superficial attack of the leisured scientist who believes that Young England of to-day is no wiser than Rousseau, the crude playing at socialism of the philanthropic clergyman whose horizon is bounded by his parish, the threat of riot and the harmless thunder of the social-democratic journalist and pamphleteer, the supercilious moving of the previous question by the professional economist who finds in Karl Marx's theory of value an excellent opportunity for a little cheap and effective criticism, or the mild pleadings of the youthful graduate that Darwinism, Toynbeeism, and Schäffle's Quintessenz can all be reconciled by a judicious use of Hegel—we do not know which of all these to expect; but, with perhaps two noteworthy exceptions, all that has appeared in England on the subject of socialism for the last ten years might be classified under one or other of these heads. We have grown weary of waiting for better things, and agree with Mr. Shaw that at present there are no authoritative teachers of socialism, and consequently, we may add, no understanding critics. But because there is no authoritative teacher and no understanding critic, it does not follow that there is no socialistic movement. A movement may ripen almost to fruit before it receives even a name, still less finds the politician or publicist ready to formulate its creed and preach its faith. Those who call themselves socialists now, if they do so intelligently and with no ulterior market-place object in view, are merely students endeavouring to understand the great social and political changes they see looming in the near future. If such socialists write, they are "communicative learners," as the Fabian essayists modestly enough claim only to be. It can hardly be denied by anyone not absolutely isolated from human intercourse that really momentous changes are taking place in our conceptions of social duty, of moral action, and of political economy—not as the theory of the schools, but as the industrial policy of the practical state. Within the last forty years the industrial policy of the state has greatly changed, and this change is being yearly accelerated. The best barometer of this change is the ambitious politician, who, whether Conservative or Liberal, is now bidding for power by proposals of open or disguised socialistic tendency. It is true that Germany has, in some respects, taken the lead; but to follow here, as in the adoption of a magazine-rifle, is merely a matter of time—a question of self-preservation for other states. The duty of keeping a record of, and generally looking after, workmen who have grown old in state employ—a duty created by the recent Insurance Act—is already having a good influence on both German official and workman.* But this Act is only the thin end of that wedge of socialist legislation which Prince Bismarck is attempting to drive through the middle-class Reichstag, not because he likes it better than the duller Junker or most self-seeking trader, but because he recognises more clearly than they that social stability demands it.†

But it is not only in the field of state industrial policy, but in ordinary social action, that the socialistic movement is making its influence felt. A different standard of personal conduct is surely but steadily gaining ground. Methods of earning money and of spending money are seen to be as important for the welfare of society at large, and, therefore, as moral or immoral, as obedience or disobedience to the Decalogue itself. We begin to question whether the idler, endowed by his ancestry, is not as anti-social as the able-bodied tramp endowed by the poor-law. The possibility of being idle means, under a more or less disguised form, support by the working members of society; and, as more of these members of society grow conscious of the fact, they are not unlikely to examine somewhat closely the title to endowment of every apparently idle man or woman. It is not only the mere fact of contributing nothing to the social stock in return for subsistence, but the grave responsibility which the endowed idler is usually under of misdirecting social labour. Owing to his or her partial monopoly of the means of production, labour is directed to the creation of luxuries rather than to raising the general standard of comfort of the productive classes. The growing consciousness of such problems as we have cited, and the increased restlessness of labour under the present system of production, are evidence enough of the shaking of the old forms of faith and life. Whither are we going? all are asking. "Blindly to an industrial and social crisis," say the old school. "Towards a more stable, industrial, and social organisation," reply the more hopeful socialists, but hitherto without explaining why or how the change is to be brought about.

The Fabian Essays are an attempt to explain the need and the method of the coming

* An Oberbauinspektor in Prussia writes to us: "Unser deutsches Leben erhielt dadurch sein eigenthümliches Gepräge, dass der Staat die grosse Kulturaufgabe der Sorge für das Gemeinwohl übernommen hat; die Kirche hielt dagegen in ihrem Wirken mehr zurück. In meiner Verwaltung—der der Strasseneorgen—wird jetzt weit besser für die kranken Arbeiter, für die alten Invaliden, wie vor 10 Jahren gesorgt. Ich führe nicht nur über die thätigen, sondern ebenso über die alten Arbeiter genau Buch. Hier bleibt eben das meiste zu leisten. Es ist ein erster Anfang." Is this first beginning, we wonder, the step of a far-seeing statesman, or the result of doctrinaire preaching of the Rousseau type?

† The action of the Kaiser with regard to the Labour Conference has taken place since these lines were written, but it only strengthens the views expressed.

social transformation, and their perusal has led us to state briefly above the arguments for socialistic change which we think the writers intend to propound.

In the first section of the book, "The Basis of Socialism," Mr. Shaw, under the heading of "Economic," deals temperately and, it seems to us, soundly with the past economic development and its relation to socialistic changes; Mr. Webb, under the heading of "Historic," traces, with perhaps a slight tendency to exaggeration, the rapid growth of socialistic legislation in England; Mr. Clarke, under the heading of "Industrial," sketches rapidly the growth of productive enterprise from the Cottage to the Trust; and, finally, in "Moral" Mr. Olivier preaches the self-obvious, but too oft forgotten, truth that moral and immoral conduct are identical respectively with social and anti-social conduct, and have relation to our neighbours and our own social efficiency, and not to any transcendental code. These four essays, if they are far too brief to represent fully the social and economic strength of the socialistic movement, are still by far the best account of the basis of socialism yet published in England; and by their temperate and "evolutionary" spirit cannot fail to be of great service in dispelling much misunderstanding of current socialism. It is noteworthy that these spokesmen rarely relapse into appeals to a vague absolute "justice" or "natural right of men." They see that the tendency to socialism is a direct outcome of the struggle of concrete societies, in a word, of the survival of the fitter, of the more stable state:

"If we desire," writes one of them, "to hand on to the afterworld our direct influence, and not merely the memory of our excellence, we must take even more care to improve the social organism of which we form part than to perfect our own individual developments. Or, rather, the perfect and fitting development of each individual is not necessarily the utmost and highest cultivation of his own personality, but the filling, in the best possible way, of his humble function in the great social machine. We must abandon the self-conceit of imagining that we are independent units, and bend our jealous minds, absorbed in their own cultivation, to this subjection to the higher end, the Common Weal. Accordingly, conscious 'direct adaptation' steadily supplants the unconscious and wasteful 'indirect adaptation' of the earlier form of the struggle for existence; and with every advance in sociological knowledge man is seen to assume more and more not only the mastery of things, but also a conscious control over social destiny itself."

Although this passage taken from its context may read here and there obscurely, the writer appears to fully recognise that, while a strongly individualistic community, where absolutely free play is given to individual self-seeking, may produce some thousands of highly ingenious and cultivated specimens of humanity, yet the cost of their production is destruction of social strength, and the individualistic society (if it can be called a "society") disappears in the struggle for existence before more stable forms, which subject the individual to the welfare and growth of the whole.

The second group of essays is entitled "The Organisation of Society." The first, on "Property under Socialism," is by Mr. Wallis, and the second, on "Industry under Socialism," by Mrs. Besant. It is admittedly harder to be constructive than critical: to attack the existing industrial system is far easier than to outline even in the most general manner the probable directions of socialistic growth. Yet, with all allowance for these inherent difficulties, and notwithstanding the disclaimer of the writers of these essays, we are bound to confess that we find them inconclusive and semi-utopian. In the second case this is the more regrettable, as the writer has exercised a remarkably beneficial influence in moderating and rationalising the first crude socialistic tendencies of large numbers of artisans and of not a few youthful but well-meaning enthusiasts. In this essay we are told on more than one occasion that a change "is just," where we should probably agree with the writer that it is expedient for social stability; but it is exactly this expediency which has to be demonstrated, and which is really shirked under any appeal to "justice." Both writers apparently look forward to the commune as the practical social unit. Indeed, in more than one place in this volume, it is stated that the origin of communal industry will hereafter be found in the county councils employing "the unemployed." Now, there cannot be a question that a very large majority of "the unemployed" are, it may be through no fault of their own, physically and mentally inefficient. Any industry started with such material as this would be a failure, except as a poor-law experiment, and in so far would tend to discredit socialistic enterprise. The first attempts at communal industry must be with the most efficient labour and in highly organised methods of production, where if the commune can have a monopoly so much the better—gas and water supply and means of transit, rail and tram, naturally suggest themselves. To propose "county farms" as industrial communities of the "unemployed," supported by the county council and competing with private enterprise, is to invite failure. The county farm, which is not to be a relief-work, and is painted in such glowing colours on p. 154, seems to us pure Utopia.

So far, indeed, from believing the commune to be the true socialistic unit, we hold that socialistic communities to be successful must possess a strong central government, whose power extends over as wide an area as possible. The commune will never be slow to push any existing local advantage at the expense of neighbouring still more of distant groups. Without the strongest central government, the peasant of Westmeath will hardly share in the industrial advantages of Manchester, Stafford, or Northampton; and the individual communes would soon be reduced to that state of disastrous jealousy so amusingly depicted by Mr. R. L. Stevenson. Just as the majority of socialistic writers will not face the fact of a strong central government, so they shirk the still more momentous population question. The present writers see the need for a strong law against the entrance of any but exceptionally highly skilled aliens; but they practically shirk the problem of how the native population is to be maintained at anything like its limit of efficiency. Until socialists honestly face that difficulty, they leave an unanswered, if not an unanswerable, argument in the power of the individualistic economist.

The third and final section of the volume is entitled "The Transition to Social Democracy," and contains two rather flippant essays, out of keeping with the general tone of the volume, by Mr. Shaw and Mr. Bland. The former paper was read at the meeting of the British Association in 1888, and its author may, perhaps, be excused for not taking the economic section or its president very seriously. Such phrases as—"On the ground of abstract justice, socialism is not only unobjectionable, but sacredly imperative"; "the sordid, slow, reluctant, cowardly path to justice"; and, "at one great stroke, to set justice on her rightful throne," are quite unworthy of Mr. Shaw. They beg the question to be demonstrated, which is the last thing that socialists have any occasion to do; and, worst of all, they really give a semblance of truth to that syllogism whose terms are socialism=Rousseauism=muddle-headness, which is such a fitting plaything for the leisure moments of science. But not only does Mr. Shaw argue feebly in this paper, we venture to think that he also proposes most demoralising conduct for the democratic municipality of the future. In order to crush the competition of private individuals, to bring down the value of the landlord's or shareholder's advantage of site, he throws out the suggestion that "the masters of the streets and the traffic can favour one site and neglect another. The rent of a shop depends on the number of persons passing its windows per hour. A skilfully timed series of experiments in paving, a new bridge, a tramway service, a barracks, or a small-pox hospital, are only a few of the circumstances of which city rents are the creatures. The power of the municipality to control these circumstances is as obvious as the impotence of competing private individuals."

If it be admitted that it is necessary for the municipality to have a monopoly, then it is far more social in the long run, because straightforward, to take it at the cost of the individual, than to obtain it by openly declaring freedom of competition, and secretly rendering competition impossible. Socialists may well leave the principle that all is fair in trade to the out-and-out individualists of the old school. We feel so certain that to perpetuate jobbery is not Mr. Shaw's idea of socialism—the whole tone of his first essay contradicts this—that we can only regret his republication of this little joke at the expense of the British Association.

As for the last essay, readers who get beyond the bad taste in the following sentence:

"All sociologists, I think, all socialists, I am sure, are agreed that until the economic moment has arrived, although the hungry or the ignorant may kick up a dust in White-chapel or make a bloody puddle in Trafalgar Square, the social revolution is impossible"—will hardly survive the English of sentences such as—

"Revolutionary heroics, natural and unblameable enough in exuberant puerility, are imbecile babblement in muscular adolescence, and in manhood would be criminal folly"; or,

"There still remains a card to play—a veritable trump. Sham socialism is the name of it, and Mr. John Morley the man to plunk it down."

Those who recognise in socialism a great force tending to regenerate society, and wish to set up a new and high standard of individual conduct—and that is certainly the view taken by the writers of the first six essays in this book—will certainly regret that any pioneer should disguise his probable earnestness by such a tone as the above sentences indicate. After all, it may be his misfortune rather than his fault.

The earlier part of the book seems to us so excellent, and to put the socialistic case so fairly, that not even the weakness of the conclusion can prevent us from heartily recommending the work to all who are interested in what is becoming more and more the question of the day.

A few words may be said in conclusion as to the process by which our authors, as well as the majority of socialists, seem to believe that socialistic measures will ultimately be carried. The complete enfranchisement of labour is to put an overwhelming power into the hands of men who, it is presumed, are socialists at heart, even if they do not yet grasp the meaning of the word. On the one hand, "socialism postulates democracy," on the other "democracy holds socialism in its womb." These are the oft-repeated doctrines of our Fabians. Personally dreading an uneducated democracy as much as a prejudiced aristocracy, and thinking that of the two the former is the slightly less stable form of government, we cannot but deprecate this identification of socialist and social-democrat. Education, our author tells us, is to come with the leisure and healthy life of a socialistic state; but that an uneducated democracy will be capable of choosing leaders who will work for the gradual and sure development of socialistic institutions, we think contrary to all historic experience. It will return the demagogue, who makes the highest bid for its votes by offering all sorts of good things in the immediate present regardless of the welfare of the future; and any such sacrifice of the future to the present must inevitably mean the destruction of social stability. Strangely paradoxical as it may seem, we may even say that the worst foe of socialistic progress will be democracy—at least that democracy which has to wait for education till the realisation of socialism. Herein lies the real value of even the small measures of autocratic socialism which Prince Bismarck deals out with one hand while he represses the social-democrats with the other. Either—socialism, education, democracy, or—education, democracy, socialism, are possible successions; but democracy, socialism, education, would mean disaster even before it reached the second term. But there is yet another factor which our authors have neglected to consider in their forecast of the result of universal enfranchisement. Long before we have made any very great advance in the socialistic direction, it is probable that woman will have received the franchise. She will form a new and unknown power, whose action it is impossible as yet to forecast, but it is highly probable that it will be individualistic in tendency. We do not go so far as the author of the third essay, who apparently holds that past social relations

"have even succeeded in producing, through inequality of freedom and education, well marked differences in mental habit, which show themselves continually when men and women are confronted with the same questions of truthfulness, honour, or logic."

But we still feel certain that women and men will for a long time judge social problems differently. While men are growing daily more socialistic, women are growing daily more individualistic. After being kept long enough in leading strings, they are struggling for personal freedom, for the right to compete with men in all fields, and to exercise their faculties for themselves and their own pleasure, no longer subservient to the will, and acting largely for the comfort, of others. The individualistic tendency of the prominent women of the day is clearly enough marked, and is extremely natural. But our ardent socialists who find their open sesame in the word "enfranchisement" must remember that they will in all probability have to sit down and wait patiently till the sad experience of individual competition has taught enfranchised woman what the last forty years of industrial development have been painfully teaching man—namely, that social welfare and social stability cannot be ensured by the maximum of individual liberty, but only by the subjection of the individual to the higher needs of the society of which he or she is a member.

KARL PEARSON.

Annals of Scottish Printing. By R. Dickson and J. P. Edmond. (Cambridge: Macmillan & Bowes.)

It is exactly a hundred years since Herbert, in the third volume of his Typographical Antiquities, published his history of the productions of the Scottish presses; and since that time little has been done to improve on his account. Dibdin, in his enlarged edition of Herbert, never got so far as Scotland. For this all bibliographers should be thankful; since had he done so, Dr. Dickson tells us, it is very probable that the present volume would never have been published; and no one who compares its careful and accurate work with Dibdin's slovenly and garrulous writing can fail to see how much we have gained.

Dr. Dickson was for many years engaged in collecting materials for the present work; but he had hardly begun to arrange them for publication when he was suddenly seized with an illness which precluded the idea of his ever continuing his task. The materials were, therefore, handed over to Mr. Edmond, to whom we are indebted not only for revising Dr. Dickson's MS., which comprises the first half of the volume, but for the entire substance of the second half, which continues the work to include all printers who had begun to exercise their craft in Scotland before 1601. There are some statements in the earlier part of the book which Dr. Dickson would, doubtless, have modified had he not been prevented from revising his notes, and which Mr. Edmond, from a natural disinclination to disturb what Dr. Dickson had written, has in his turn left unaltered.

The first ten chapters are entirely taken up with an account of the circumstances which led to the establishment of the first press, the history of Myllar the first printer and his associate Chepman, and an account of the books which they printed.

Soon after the beginning of the sixteenth century, the need for a printing press in Scotland was strongly felt; and Bishop Elphinstone, eager to have his adaptation of the Sarum Breviary for use in Scotland printed under his own supervision, used his influence with the king in order that "an prent with all stuff belandand therto and expert men to use the samyne" might be brought into Edinburgh from abroad. Andrew Myllar, an Edinburgh stationer, who had expressed his willingness to undertake the task, seems in 1507 to have gone to France, assisted by the wealth of Walter Chepman, a merchant, for the purpose both of acquiring a practical knowledge of the art and of procuring printing materials. Before this time Myllar had employed a Rouen press to print for him editions of popular books; and, since it would doubtless be to the printer of these that he would go both for materials and instruction, it is of some interest to discover who this printer was. Unfortunately none of his books bear any name, so that we are left to conjecture his identity from a study of the types which he used. Dr. Dickson, on the authority of M. Claudin, has ascribed the Rouen printed books to the press of L. Hostinque, but perhaps on insufficient grounds. It seems much more probable that they were printed by P. Violette, whose types are identical with those used in the books for Myllar, and who, in 1507, used the cut found on the title page of the Garlandia of 1505. He also printed, probably for Myllar, a Stambridge's Accidence, but the only portions known were discovered too late to be described in the present volume.

After the return of Myllar from Rouen, but before the production of the Aberdeen Breviary, the Edinburgh press issued a series of poetical pamphlets, known only from unique copies preserved in the Edinburgh University Library. The first nine of these tracts, all printed in the same type, have as a rule a device or colophon, so that there can be no doubt about their printer, though we can hardly agree with Dr. Dickson in saying that the types with which they are printed "were most probably cut specially for the new Scottish press," seeing that the W among them is supplied from another fount, an almost conclusive proof that the types were cut for use in France, where no W would be required. The tenth piece is ascribed, unreasonably we think, to a foreign press. There are strong arguments in favour of its having been printed in Scotland; and Dr. Dickson, as a Scotchman, had always the right to fall back on the Scotch verdict of "not proven." The eleventh and last piece in the volume, in spite of its typographical likeness to the work of Herman Bumgart, of Cologne, is evidently printed by John of Doesborch, who issued from his Antwerp press editions of many popular English books.

The chapters on the Aberdeen Breviary, the Complaynt of Scotland, and the printers Story, Davidson, Scot, and Lekpreuk, which follow and finish the first part of the book, are all very carefully treated, and contain much that is entirely new, especially as regards the books printed by Davidson and Lekpreuk.

The chief and almost only drawback to the first part of the volume is the want of any scientific treatment of the types. Such a study, if carefully pursued, cannot fail to throw light upon the history of the printers and help materially towards the arrangement of undated books; while, if neglected, it may lead a writer into statements which, though plausible, are absolutely unsound. Davidson, for instance, seems to have used the type which Myllar brought from Rouen, or a fount so similar as to be practically undistinguishable, thus showing that he was in some way connected with the first press. Most of his ornaments and cuts, on the other hand, were obtained from the English printer Peter Treveris. It is interesting to notice that the border to the title-page of the Strena (facsimiled on p. 120) belonged first to Treveris, and was used by him in some editions of Whittington; so that the date 1528 here ascribed to the book must be highly improbable, if not impossible, as the cuts would not have found their way into Scotland till after the cessation of Treveris's press, which did not occur till after 1532. The question of the identity of John Scot, the Edinburgh printer, with the English printer of the same name might also be settled by a careful examination of the types; and, though Dr. Dickson seems to have gone a little into this question, his researches have not enabled him to arrive at any very definite conclusion.

The second portion of the book, for which Mr. Edmond is responsible, is a most able piece of work, and seems placed by its excellence almost beyond the reach of criticism. The biographies of the later printers, though necessarily more condensed than those in the earlier part of the volume, omit no information which is either interesting or important. The collations of books seem drawn up with great care and accuracy; so much so that after a good deal of reference we have only discovered one error, and that in the description of a book of which no perfect copy was available for examination. In this respect, indeed, the book compares favourably with most of the recently published works of a similar class, and shows that combination of method and accuracy which might have been expected from the author of the Aberdeen Printers.

To compile a bibliography of Scotch books is a much more difficult task than might at first be supposed. There was in Scotland no Company answering to that of the Stationers in England, whose registers form such a mine of information for English workers on the subject. The inventories of the printers themselves, the only documents of this kind remaining, are often confused and misleading; for, since the printers were as a rule also booksellers, we have no means of separating such books as they had themselves printed from others they had merely bought for their stock. It is only, so to speak, by accident that new information can be gained or new books discovered, so that it is quite possible that even now, in spite of the authors' care, many books may have escaped their research. On the other hand the subject has many advantages. It is not too wide to be treated fully. Indeed, Scotland produced in the sixteenth century not many more books than had appeared from the English presses of the fifteenth; and the continuity of the presses is in many cases easily traced. The number of books in the vernacular and their strong nationality give the subject interest from a literary and historical point of view; while, as the introduction of printing took place at a comparatively late date, almost all the charters relating to the art, and the wills and inventories of the printers, are in existence to give their evidence concerning its rise and progress. These in many cases the authors have wisely reprinted in full—an addition which all students will appreciate, for nothing is more annoying in books of this class than to be continually brought up by references which are at the time impossible to verify.

We cannot help regretting that Mr. Edmond has not given us a longer chapter on the "doubtful and spurious works" and—even though it may be considered beyond the scope of his subject—an account of the few books printed abroad during this period in the Scotch language.

The publishers appear to have spared no expense to bring out the book in a way worthy of its contents, and have very wisely issued it in a size to range with the works of Herbert and Diddin. The paper and print are remarkably good; and they show that, whatever we may think of the early Scottish printers, those of the present day are at the head of their profession. The facsimiles are the one weak point in the volume. Some are good, but others are very bad; and it seems a pity that in these days of excellent processes one liable to such variations should have been employed.

The main purpose, however, of the authors has been to provide a reliable bibliography of Scottish books, and in this they have succeeded perfectly. To say that it is the best book on the subject is but faint praise; to say it could hardly be better is only just.

E. GORDON DUFF.

Songs without Music. By Hamilton Aïdè. (Bell.)

ASSUREDLY, when in some future age the story of the literary life of this generation comes to be written, few figures who have moved through it will attract more comment and attention than that of Mr. Hamilton Aïdè. We may even anticipate that some historical doubts may in time be cast upon and controversy may arise as to the existence, as one separate entity, of this gentleman who has played so many parts in his life. Our great-grandchildren may perhaps have set before them some such final summing-up of the controversy as this: It is now pretty generally agreed that the novelist, playwright, and poet was one person, and the painter and composer a contemporary, probably a relation, while the writer of one of the most successful farce-comedies of that age was clearly some aspiring young dramatist who impertinently appropriated a name that had already become doubly eminent.

The world is an invidious world, let the optimist say what he will, and contemporaries are very chary of praise to him who has done very many things very well. Remembering this, the present critic will be as abstemious of approbation as he can find it in his conscience to be with Mr. Aïdè's new volume of songs and recitations.

There is poetry meant to be read in silence, and poetry meant to be sung, or meant to be dramatically recited. Of the latter two kinds are these so-called "Songs without Music" of Mr. Hamilton Aïdè. It is, I believe, usual to consider the former species—the silent verse, the aesthetic outgrowth of a later age of civilisation, when books had begun to be written and read, and the poet no longer possessed a real lyre or needed a tuneful voice—as the higher kind of verse production. It may be so. The silent verse has more scope for thought; and its harmonies, which must appeal to the ear through the eye, require to be more subtle than in the case of the lyric that is to be sung. The typical song in more modern times, which is meant to be heard musically, is of that kind which is interspersed in the plays of the Elizabethan dramatists, notably of Shakspeare and Ben Jonson; while among typical songs for the eye alone are the exquisite lyrics of Shelley. Samuel Lover, the song writer, declares that no one could possibly sing "The fresh earth in new leaves drest," from one of Shelley's songs. It is not necessary to enquire here why this line, and most of Shelley's verses, and the vast majority of literary poetry generally, are unsingable; and why, on the other hand, every scrap of seemingly careless lyric interspersed through Shakspeare's plays is immediately translatable into audible song. Every singer knows that he can sing "Full fathom five thy father lies," or "Come unto these yellow sands!" or "Under the greenwood tree," though perhaps he could give no full and sufficient reason for the fact. Mr. Aïdè's "Songs without Music" fulfil the conditions that the dramatists' songs fulfil. They possess the same apparently simple structure, while they conform to the same difficult melodic conditions.

Here now is a true singer's song from Mr. Hamilton Aïdè's book, with all the right careless grace and ease about it. A merely literary critic might complain of the rhyme to Chloë as beneath the dignity of verse; but, in truth, it enhances the freshness and raciness of the song:

"Chloë sat beside the river,
Sighing to the murmuring reeds,
'Love has wandered off for ever,
Far and farther he recedes!'
Maidens, weep for poor young Chloë!
Scorned she Love, when blithe and gay:
Vengeful Cupid heard her; so he Punishes the maid to-day.
"Chloë was beloved by Damon,
Straight and proud she bore her head;
Now the tree he carved her name on Bears another name instead!
Maidens, weep for poor young Chloë!
She who will not when she may,
Angers vengeful Cupid; so he Punishes the maid to-day!"

Fletcher or Lyly might have let this lyric into their plays along with the "Beauty clear and fair" of the first, or the "Cupid and my Campaspe played" of the second. It would not have shamed either of these great song writers; and in Mr. Aïdè's charming little volume many a song as good and tuneable as this may be found.

OSWALD CRAWFORD.

The Lancashire Life of Bishop Fraser. By John W. Diggle. (Sampson Low.)

IN the spring of 1887 Mr. Thomas Hughes published a biography of the late Bishop of Manchester (reviewed by the present writer in the ACADEMY, March 26, 1887), which was at once accepted as an excellent portrait. It cannot be said that Canon Diggle's book either alters the outline or modifies the picture painted by Judge Hughes. What it does is to put in, carefully and successfully, many additional details that will be read with eager interest in Lancashire and, it may be hoped, elsewhere. The book is not intended to supersede, but to supplement the biography already published. As the story of Bishop Fraser's Lancashire life "is told as far as possible in the Bishop's own words," many of these 565 pages are occupied by letters and extracts from letters, and by passages from speeches and sermons dealing with a multitude of incidents and topics. We have thus the bishop's views on many subjects, from vestments to intemperance, and from Socinianism to the Sunday opening of art galleries and libraries. Some of these are elaborate disquisitions, others mere obiter dicta.

Literature plays a very inconspicuous part. The bishop's Lancashire life was too busy to allow him much time either for reading or research; and, in addition to this impediment of scanty leisure, it cannot be doubted that his interest was more in men than in books. His own style was clear and fluent, perfect in its simplicity and directness, and sometimes, when he had "the courage of his impulses," most impressively eloquent. He won the hearts of the Lancashire people by a plainness of speech that was the index of a genuine simplicity of life. He moved among all classes, but seems to have enjoyed himself most when addressing audiences of artisans. He never fell into the fatal mistake that brings so many well-meaning men to uselessness—that of "talking down" to the supposed lower level of a congregation or meeting. Frank and plain as were all his addresses, they were full of material for thinking; and their style was such as to attract the admiration of the educated, while they did not fly over the heads of those to whom they were spoken, but were fully "understood of the common people." He closed an ordination address with the words "Be humble, be earnest, be real." Canon Diggle justly observes: "In those three injunctions the whole man unconsciously described himself."

The miserable story of the Miles Platting and Cheetham Hill cases has to be told again; and Canon Diggle, following the lead of Judge Hughes, endorses every action taken by Bishop Fraser in his dealings with the Rev. S. F. Green and the Rev. C. F. Gunton. In both cases we hold that he grievously blundered. That he felt so himself, as regards Miles Platting, is evident from his declaration that if such another case arose he would veto the proceedings (p. 403). The high ritual of Mr. Green at St. John's had the approval of the congregation, and the strife was stirred up by interlopers. Had the bishop given sufficient consideration to this in his interview with Mr. Green (p. 403), the whole of the subsequent scandals would probably have been avoided. While Mr. Green was in prison the bishop allowed the curate to continue the same acts for which the rector was punished. When Mr. Cowgill was "presented" to the living, the bishop refused to institute him unless he would promise as rector to give up the ritual he had been allowed to observe as curate. Clearly the bishop's position is untenable and inconsistent. So with regard to

Mr. Gunton, who was accused of holding "Socinian" views. He was—and is—a man of earnest character, of blameless life, of praiseworthy activity as curate of St. John's, Cheetham Hill; and when the living became vacant the bishop was asked by the whole of the "church-workers," and by practically the entire adult population of the parish, to appoint him rector. This the bishop refused to do on the ground that Mr. Gunton's views on the divinity of Christ did not reach "the level of such grand passages as Col. i. 9-29" (p. 429). But Mr. Gunton was allowed as curate to continue working in the very parish which the bishop was so anxious to protect against him as incumbent. Soon afterwards Mr. Gunton was offered a living in the bishopric of Carlisle; and the bishop of the diocese, who could not be ignorant of his previous history, instituted him without demur. What was heresy in Manchester was orthodoxy in Cumberland. But what made the reproach of these proceedings was that Bishop Fraser, while thus visiting with episcopal severity two men of high character, of pure and even noble lives, took no such course with priests whose modes of life were somewhat of a scandal to the diocese. It was a strange irony of fate that placed Dr. Fraser, certainly one of the most tolerant and liberal of men, in the unaccustomed and uncongenial attitude of an ally of the spirit of persecution. That he felt the position keenly is certain; as also that he acted with the best of motives; but that he acted unwisely seems no less certain, and it is better to admit unpleasant facts than to try to explain them away.

Perhaps the most interesting parts of the volume are those dealing with the bishop's intercourse with the working classes, concerning which there are several curious anecdotes, as well as letters from bricklayers, "cobblers," and others. Dr. Fraser was the most punctual and most courteous of correspondents; and, notwithstanding the many claims upon his time, he rarely, if ever, employed a secretary. In his letters, as in his speeches, there is the same clearness and the same depth of sympathy that gained him the goodwill of so many and such diverse men and women. There were persons in the diocese when he came there who understood and practised the gospel of plain living and public spirit. The following passage is a curious testimony, supplied by a friend of the bishop's, to Canon Diggle:

"A week or two afterwards I met him at the dinner-table of a friend. He was lost in amazement at what he called an extraordinary peculiarity of the Lancashire character—i.e., the simplicity and homeliness of the lives of many of those who made large gifts for public and religious charities. 'I got out at B— Station,' he said, 'and, after a sharp walk of twenty minutes, came in sight of the church at the distance of about a mile. I was struck even then with its nobility. "Can you tell me where Mr. W— lives?" I inquired of a pedestrian, "the gentleman who has built this noble church?" "Oh, ay, it's yon cottage against yon bank." Thinking there was some mistake, I went on, and presently overtook a girl in Sunday attire. "Can you tell me where Mr. W— lives, who built this noble church?" "That's it," she replied, pointing to the same unpretentious cottage. "I'm going to th' consecration." Still I considered there was an error somewhere, but made my way to the door. An old woman, simply but respectably dressed, answered my knock. I dared not ask if Mr. W— was in. I repeated my question—"Can you tell me where Mr. W— lives who built this noble church?" "Oh, you're the Bishop, are you? He's bein' expecting on you—Come forrard, you'll find him i' th' kitchen." Ushered into the kitchen, I found an old but fine looking man sitting by the fire smoking a churchwarden pipe. "So you've come, have you?" said the smoker, "Nowt like being in good time. There'll be a snack of something when you've done." "You have done nobly by the district, Mr. W—," I said, seizing his hand, and giving it a hearty grasp. He gave me an equally hearty squeeze, but seemed surprised. "Naw, naw," he said, "I made the population with my mills, so I mun do my duty by them." "In the south of England," continued the Bishop, "such a gift and such a function would have brought the whole county society together, and the donor would have been the recipient of unbounded admiration and praise. It was a new experience."

Dr. Fraser's soundness of judgment, as well as his kindness of heart, were fully recognised:

"Every one in a difficulty ran to the bishop—priests and people, churchwardens and parishioners, clergy and laity, husbands in trouble with incompatible wives, wives in distress with reckless husbands, young men wanting to marry, young ladies perplexed with their love affairs, employers harassed with workmen, workmen depressed by their employers, religious people with their doubts, inventive people with their discoveries, literary aspirants with their effusions, even mad people with their hallucinations. If the walls of Bishop's Court could speak, many hundreds of strange tales of the hidden inner life of Manchester could they tell, tales poured into the sympathetic ear of the bishop."

His greatest claim is as the "citizen bishop"; and as such he had the affectionate goodwill of all classes of the Manchester community, which contains representatives of every possible shade of belief and unbelief. They respected his honesty and candour, they valued and feared his criticism, their enthusiasm was excited by his homely life and unselfish devotion to the public good. He is the only Anglican prelate of modern times who has won such a position. His statue, the only one erected in a public place to a bishop of the Church of England, stands in the square outside the great town-hall. Toilworn men and women pass and repass it throughout the busy hours, and the stream of industry eddies about it. Surrounded by the evidences of civic and commercial greatness, and almost opposite the birthplace of Lancashire's great prose-poet, De Quincey, the statue of Bishop Fraser—"a citizen of no mean city"—stands as a symbol of the beneficent influence that practical religion may exert upon the life of a community.

PAMPHLETS ABOUT CANADA.

Canada: a Memorial Volume. Edited by E. B. Biggar. (Edward Stanford.)

THIS bulky volume of nearly a thousand pages is made up of a series of monographs on the various provinces and aspects of the Dominion, written by different authors, in a variety of styles, and with varying degrees of excellence. When we add that the type, and sometimes the paper also, display a curious dissimilarity, and that the pagination is not continuous, we may infer that the book is really a bound set of those puffing pamphlets which Canada, like our colonies generally, is so fond of issuing for the benefit of crudulous emigrants and un-instructed capitalists.

As a rule, the contents are fairly accurate, being for the most part compiled from official documents; though here and there the sources of information are not of the most authoritative character. Their worst feature is the tendency to indiscriminate laudation. Every province is as rich as—and, if possible, richer than—its neighbours. The climate is magnificent (even when its most marked features are mosquitoes for five months and frost for the rest of the year), and the soil exuberant. This kind of "blow" to use the colonial expression, is more apt to do harm than good; and when we find the semi-arctic valley of the Mackenzie River recommended as an agricultural region, in spite of the evisceration which the Parliamentary Report on the subject received in 1888, one is apt to become sceptical regarding the soundness of the data laid before the reader. Still, that conclusion would be unfair, though the writers seldom tell the whole truth, and have a proneness to inflated praise of their particular provinces without pointing out their drawbacks. Nor is there any literary perspective displayed in the treatment of the different sections—New Brunswick being accorded a space nearly three times that allotted to Nova Scotia, more than twice the number of pages given to Ontario, and almost ten times as many as are thought sufficient for the wealthy province of British Columbia.

The chapter on the fur-animals is perhaps the best in the book, though the writer of it appears to have drawn his information from too restricted an area. Those on the fisheries are less deserving of praise, and not without errors. The oulachan, for example, is a smelt—a fact with which the compiler does not seem to be aware. Nor is there any river called the Bass; and—to note other deficiencies in the account of British Columbia—no mention is made of the remarkable discovery of gold in Vancouver Island during the summer of 1865, though the reefs from whence it came were never identified. On the other hand, the worst sections of this semi-official handbook are those devoted to the native tribes. Here is a specimen:

"The aboriginal people of the North American continent are divided into two groups, the one Malay-Polynesian, and the other Turanian in origin. These groups are both represented in Canada; the Algonquins belong to the former, the Iroquois, Tinnehs, and Esquimaux to the latter. Through the Algonquins, Canada's aborigines are connected with the people inhabiting the vast area from Malacca to New Zealand, and from Madagascar to the Sandwich and Easter Islands. Through the Iroquois they are connected with the Finnic, Turkic, and Mongolic classes of Asian and European peoples. The two are distinct."

A good deal of nonsense has been expended over the American Indians; but anything more egregiously absurd than this does not come within our recollection.

Most of the maps scattered through the book are good, and (with some exceptions) the same may be said of the woodcuts.

NEW NOVELS.

An Ocean Tragedy. In 3 vols. By W. Clark Russell. (Chatto & Windus.)

The Bull & th' Thorn. In 3 vols. By Paul Cushing. (Blackwood.)

A Last Love. By Georges Ohnet. (Chatto & Windus.)

A Sydney Sovereign. By Tasma. (Triibner.)

Three Diggers. By Percy Clarke. (Sampson Low.)

A Far Look Ahead. By Ismar Thiisen. (Putnam's.)

It is regrettable when so able a novelist as Mr. Clark Russell condescends to let the probabilities go by the board. The writer who too obviously assumes the part of Providence in the disposition of his dramatis personae has to pay the penalty of alienating the sympathy of many readers. Children like to shut their eyes when the story-teller comes to the thrilling parts; but they indignantly resent being defrauded of initial belief in the veracity of the tale. This is what Mr. Clark Russell does in An Ocean Tragedy. Who would not gladly yield to the charming of so skilled a magician as the author of The Wreck of "The Grosvenor," "The Golden Hope," "John Holdsworth," and Jenny Harlowe? How easy it was to believe in the thrilling tale evolved in each of those romances; how delightful to revel in the smell of the brine, in the sound of the sea, in the wholesome vigour of seafaring ways! But, in his latest book, our foremost sea-novelist gives the reader's ready interest a bludgeon-blow at the start; and a story, morbid and unreal—morbid because unreal, and felt to be unreal—is made to do duty as a successor to the brilliant and deservedly popular works just enumerated. There is so much power and vigour, so much of the old charm, that I must believe Mr. Clark Russell adopted a foolish and improbable plot under sudden compulsion, and then strove to make the most of it. I am certainly loth to believe that he would put forward An Ocean Tragedy as one of his high-tide books. It is doubtful if the reader's sympathies will be evoked by any personage in the story—even by Laura Jennings, for all her charms of mind and body (including her hair of "dark gold.") As for the hero, Charles Monson, he never becomes distinct. He bears too strong a resemblance to some of his fictitious predecessors; and I am afraid it goes without saying that Laura is the same "lady who always takes the love-parts." The Ocean Tragedy is a story of madness and crime, with a secondary motive of love running through it; and of course there is wild adventure galore. Sir Wilfrid Monson is half mad to start with; he becomes two-thirds insane when his wife elopes with a shadowy Colonel Hope-Kennedy; and long before the story is at an end he is an imbecile. None the less, he comes to the fore again at the close, apparently all the better for his exciting experiences. The crime of Lady Monson and the Colonel is involved in circumstances which make it doubly shameful. The story is that of the chase of the runaways. It is ridiculous to suppose that even a half-sane gentleman would have taken his sister-in-law with him on his errand of vengeance; for, though Laura sails in "The Bride" under the plea of her problematical suasive powers over her sister, when "The Bride" should overtake "The Shark" in mid-ocean, she really lives, moves, and has her being on Sir Wilfrid's ill-fated yacht simply to the end that Charles Monson may have someone with whom to fall in love. But in a dozen other instances there are improbabilities of the most obvious kind. Still, perhaps the most disappointing thing about the book is its misproportion. It should have been a tale, not a novel; but, if a novel, then restricted within the limits of artistic need. The story really ends at the close of the second volume. The rest is interesting "material." On its good qualities it is unnecessary to enlarge. Who does not know Mr. Clark Russell's mastery? Some of his most delightful, certainly some of his most picturesque, writing is here. Wild storms and depressing calms, strange encounters, shipwrecks, volcanic islands that rise and subside, and much else beside is here for entertainment. But most of the story is as unnecessary as the long episode of the encounter with the Portuguese brig, as morbid as the wild imaginings of Sir Wilfrid, as artistically worthless as the utterly depraved Lady Monson, as unreal as the Scottish earl who remarks to a suitor for one of his daughters, "Guid preserve us . . . the Lady Elizabeth's seester"—"seester" evidently being Mr. Clark Russell's conception of how Scots lords, not to speak of humbler Caledonians, pronounce "sister." These be hard words; but they are, at any rate, the hard words of an ardent admirer. We can afford to let mediocre men produce poor books occasionally; but masters of their craft have to reckon with the scrupulous heed of discriminating readers—a class likely to become more and more exigent, as work is added to work.

I recollect reviewing in the ACADEMY Mr. Paul Cushing's Blacksmith of Voe. Its looseness of plot and eccentricities of style did not counter-balance its freshness and vigour, and, indeed, general interest. But The Bull & th' Thorn seems to me to have the faults and but a modicum of the literary charm of its predecessor. There is enough padding in it to occupy, at the very least, one of the three volumes through which the tale meanders, too often with a distinctly "mazy motion." Crump is a villain after Mr. Cushing's liking. We have met him before, with Mr. Cushing, in different guises. Ultimately Crump and Lady Poloc—to whom that hard-worked epithet "weird" might with approximate aptitude be applied—try to murder the latter's son, disguised as a wayfarer of the pedlar kind. But the real interest of the story lies in the Mexican part, where the hero serves under the patriot General Morelos and becomes known as "El Leon de Mejico." If The Bull & th' Thorn were a third of its present length, and were restricted to the hero's share in the Mexican War of Independence, it would be as able and entertaining as it is now somewhat heavy and forced. As in all Mr. Cushing's work that I have read, the showman obtrudes himself too often and for too long at a time. The drum should be beaten less frequently, the curtain should not be so constantly pulled this way and that.

If M. Georges Ohnet's success in France be a matter of surprise to those who believe in an inherent Gallic appreciation of what is excellent in literature, one may well be bewildered at his growing popularity in England. That it is growing is undeniable, and independently of the interest created by "The Ironmaster" as a play. I have seen A Last Love spoken of as a masterpiece, as a brilliant and dramatic story, as a thrilling romance of real life, and so forth. No doubt it is unfair to judge a book in a translation except as a translation; but this I am compelled to do, not having read the original, nor having any wish to read it. Mr. Albert Vandam's version, which seems to be faithful, is more than enough to satisfy me. The book has all M. Ohnet's faults: his commonplaceness of plot, his commonplaceness of motive, his commonplace presentment of his personages. The story moves heavily and even lumberingly, nor has it any lifting central idea such as that which animated Doctor Ramsau. It has evidently been written with an eye to the stage. There is certainly more than enough clap-trap in it to make a successful melodrama.

The writer who has adopted the pseudonym Tasma is well-known as one of the most able of the small but steadily increasing band of Australian romancists. Her stories are all well worth reading, for their style is as pleasing as their substance is interesting. A Sydney Sovereign is one of five tales collected in a volume that takes its title from it. All are good, the first and the last ("Monsieur Caloche") particularly so. I remember having read "Monsieur Caloche" somewhere, but reperusal has not made that pathetic story lose anything of its charm. This charm is all in the telling, for the ruse of the young girl passing herself off for a youth is as old as Boccaccio, and probably a good deal older.

There is much more of Australia—conventional Australia—in the Three Diggers than in Tasma's book, but the "local colouring" is just a little too much in evidence. The novel has brightness and go, however, as might be expected in a work by the author of the entertaining New Chum in Australia; and it will no doubt be welcome to many who have kindred living under the Southern Cross.

Ismar Thiisen's romance is an interesting book of the Looking Backward type. It is the earlier work, however, for under the name of The Diothas it was published six years ago. With a good deal that is wearisome there is much careful consideration of present-day problems; and, though as a romance in the true sense it is of little worth, it is by no means void either of interest or of picturesque incidents. But there are signs, ominous signs, that the "novel of the future" is about to become as great a nuisance as those once dreaded inflictions—the patriotic Irish novel and the novel of the hustings. For those who rejoice in remote perspectives A Far Look Ahead may be recommended. Mr. Bellamy's famous book deals with a period which seems almost immediate compared with that of Ismar Thiisen's romance. In the latter we skip eighty centuries. On one point there is no comparison of the two books; the Look Ahead is here triumphant. In Looking Backward the "chimney-pot hat" of present-day civilisation has survived the crash of empires. Among the Diothas nothing is worn upon the occiput; for among the gentlemen of the ninety-sixth century there is no baldness, but a universal amplitude of curly locks. Generations must pass before the tall hat is abolished, but it is a great and inspiring thought that somewhere between the twentieth and the hundredth century it will "suffer a — change."

WILLIAM SHARP.

SOME HISTORICAL BOOKS.

"THE STORY OF THE NATIONS." — The Barbary Corsairs. By Stanley Lane-Poole. With Additions by Lieut. J. D. J. Kelley, U.S. Navy. (Fisher Unwin.) In this volume, Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole has the advantage of treating of a subject which is at the same time full of interest and popularly but little known. The history of the Barbary corsairs falls naturally into two strongly-marked periods, divided by the battle of Lepanto in 1571. The earlier portion, which records the struggle of Christian Europe with the Barbarossas and their immediate successors, is a story of heroic deeds on both sides; and the author has related it with full appreciation of its romantic interest. From the battle of Lepanto down to the present century the history is of a wholly different character. The vulgar ruffians who ruled the Barbary states had no qualities that can excite respect, and the account of the abject submission of the European powers to the ravages of such wretches can only be read with disgust and humiliation. It is remarkable that the first effectual attempt for more than two hundred years to free the civilised world from the burden of African piracy was made by the United States in the early years of the present century. The work, however, was only completed by the French conquest of Algeria in 1830. Mr. Lane-Poole writes with just severity of the cruelties by which this conquest was followed; but, although these proceedings cannot be palliated, it ought not to be forgotten that the seizure of Algiers was in itself justified in the interests not only of France but of Europe as a whole. The author's concluding remarks on the recent French aggression in Tunis, and the attitude of the English government at the time, are perhaps a little outside the proper limits of his subject. The illustrations, though fewer in number than in some of the other volumes of the series, have the merit of really elucidating the text.

"DIOCESAN HISTORIES." — Carlisle. By Richard S. Ferguson. (S.P.C.K.) We feel certain that there is no one else so capable of writing a history of the diocese of Carlisle as Mr. Ferguson has proved himself to be. His knowledge is of an exhaustive character; but knowledge alone will not fit a person to write about our English bishoprics. In nearly every one of them questions have to be discussed wherein the embers of religious controversy smoulder, and a small amount of error or exaggeration might cause the fires of religious controversy to flame up in their ancient fierceness. Mr. Ferguson, however, knows far too much of past times to write as a partizan. There is another difficulty from which he and his fellow-workers have suffered. The limits of the dioceses have been so changed in recent times that it is very difficult to tell the story of many of them coherently. Henry VIII. began the process by forming sundry new sees, and endowing them out of the forfeited monastic property. His changes, however, can easily be kept in memory; but the alterations which have taken place during the lifetime of many persons still living are hopelessly confusing. Prime ministers and ecclesiastical commissioners are not reputed to have much regard for any history beyond the days of their grandfathers. Had it been otherwise the spiritual wants of our growing population might have been dealt with in a manner that would have done far less violence to tradition. The present diocese of Carlisle includes Cumberland (with the exception of one parish), the whole of Westmoreland, and a portion of Lancashire. It is compact, as shown on the map; but much of the country is wild moorland and fell, not to be reached, even now, without much trouble. The mediæval history of the diocese of Carlisle has few attractions for the ecclesiastical student. The events that happened were mainly of a political colour. The constant wars with the Scotch made Cumberland no pleasant place of residence. The parishes, however, considering the unfortunate circumstances, seem to have been well provided for. The northern parochial system differed much from what is commonly to be found in midland and southern shires. The great religious houses held a large portion of the livings, and the churches were served by the monks or canons belonging to them. Whatever may be urged against this practice elsewhere, it certainly had no little justification on the Scottish border. The great monasteries were well able not only to protect themselves against mere raids, but also to take care of their brethren who were scattered far and wide among the lonely hills. It was only in time of open war between the two nations that the latter had much to fear. Afterwards, when the Reformation came, and the tithes, which had been the property of the monks, found their way into lay hands, the parish churches were but scantily provided for. We need not, therefore, be surprised that when the "Pilgrimage of Grace" set all the North of England aflame, the men of Cumberland joined in it heart and soul. A courier was at once dispatched to tell Henry VIII. how matters stood. Mr. Ferguson gives his readers a passage from the king's reply which is characteristic of the man:

"Our pleasure is, that before you shall close up our said baner again, you shall, in any wise, cause such dreadful execution to be doon upon a good nombre of the inhabitants of every toun, village, and hamlet, that have offended in this rebellion, as well by hanging them up in trees, as by the quartering of them and the setting of their heddes and quarters in every toun, great and small, and in all such other places, as they may be a fereful spectacle to all other hereafter."

Seventy-four poor creatures were hanged in Cumberland and Westmoreland; but, much to the anger of the authorities whose function it was to execute the royal mandate, "the bodies were out down and buried by certain women." When John Best, the earliest Reformed Bishop of Carlisle, held his first visitation, thirteen or fourteen of the vicars and rectors of the diocese did not attend; and the old services continued to be used in the churches as in bygone days. Such contumacy naturally ruffled the bishop. He described the clergy as "wicked imps of Antichrist; ignorant, stubborn, and past measure false and subtle." The lords and justices of the peace, he said, "looked through their fingers" while the law was openly violated. The slaughters which followed upon the suppression of the "Pilgrimage of Grace," terrible as it was, did not act as a warning. Once more, early in the reign of Elizabeth, the North of England rose in arms under the leadership of the heads of the great houses of Percy and Nevil. On the suppression of this rising, when

"The Percy's crescent set in blood,"

Mr. Ferguson says that more than six hundred of the insurgents were put to death. How many of them were Cumbrians he does not seem to have ascertained. We have reason to believe that the North Riding of the county of York suffered at this time more cruelly than the other regions which were implicated. We cannot follow Mr. Ferguson's narrative step by step as we should wish to do. Limited as is his space, we must give unmixed praise to his account of the later times. The eighteenth century was not a glorious period for the Church of England anywhere. In Cumberland, where the livings were so pitifully small, we do not find it at its best. At one time, Mr. Ferguson says, on account of their poverty many of the chapelries were served by lay "readers"; but in the time of George II. it was arranged that no one should officiate who was not in deacon's orders. We cannot gather from what he has said whether these "readers" and deacons celebrated the communion or not. Some of the former class must have had little education. One is described as a "clogger," another was a "tailor," and a third a "butter-print maker." We have heard of a clergyman in Wales who was a basket-maker, and of several who kept public-houses; but we had hitherto thought the statements fables. In no part of England has ecclesiastical reform moved faster than in this diocese. Things began to mend early in this century. Hardly any single man since the Reformation has done more to raise the tone of the clergy than the present Bishop of Carlisle.

THE two volumes of Horace Walpole's Letters (Fisher Unwin) which Mr. C. D. Yonge has selected and annotated will be within the reach of many unable to purchase or to find room on their bookshelves for the nine volumes of Peter Cunningham's standard edition. Some admirable communications to Sir Horace Mann have, perhaps, been omitted, and some may have been chosen which might have given place to others; but the editor has to cater for all tastes, and it would be unpardonable not to recognise the judgment which marks his selection. Let the reader, when he has digested the political allusions transmitted by Walpole month by month to his friend at Florence, and the witticisms picked up by him at Brooks's, extend his acquaintance to the rest of those letters, and he will not fail to thank Mr. Yonge for this introduction to so bright a world. The polite letter-writer had travelled much in France, had inherited from his father the friendship of many of its most illustrious natives, and had made new acquaintances of his own among the literati of Paris. Mr. Yonge has himself studied deeply the chief characters in French history under the Bourbons, and it is in this portion of the task of annotating Horace Walpole's correspondence that the editor's notes will be most appreciated. When we peruse his remarks on other subjects, we do not always find ourselves in complete agreement. It is not an accepted fact in the biography of the Walpoles that the bachelor of Strawberry Hill succeeded to the family peerage "on the death of his elder brother." A worthless nephew, through whose dissipations the Orford pictures passed to Russia and the family estates became involved in debt, intervened between the two brothers. Miss Seward was certainly not the author "of that most ingenious riddle on the letter H"; the ingenuity displayed in its composition came from the brain of Miss Catherine Fanshawe, a lady of far greater poetic feeling. These volumes are excellently printed, and they are adorned with admirable portraits of the author and his chief friends, as well as with some views of the principal buildings of Strawberry Hill. They would afford much gratification to anyone fond of life a hundred years ago.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THOSE who may have seen the telegraphic report of an accident to Miss Amelia B. Edwards, during her lecturing tour in America, will be glad to hear that she herself writes lightly of it. Such, indeed, is her indomitable energy that she did not even allow it to interfere with her engagements. The facts are these. On Monday, March 6, when staying at Columbus, Ohio, she slipped on the stairs and broke one of the bones in her left arm, about two inches above the wrist. The fracture was at once skilfully set; and not only did she deliver her lecture that evening, but she went on by the night train to Pittsburgh and lectured there on Tuesday. On the Wednesday evening she was lecturing before the Philadelphia Academy of Music to an audience of 2500; and on Thursday afternoon she again lectured at New York, whence she writes in the best of spirits.

MR. CLARK RUSSELL has been commissioned by Messrs. Methuen to write a Life of Admiral Lord Collingwood, the famous second in command at the battle of Trafalgar. The noble and heroic character of this fine seaman, though abundantly recognised by his contemporaries, has hardly met with the recognition it merits at the hands of posterity.

DR. JESSOPP has collected a second series of his articles from the Nineteenth Century into a volume, which will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, under the title "Trials of a Country Parson," with a special introduction.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHNEN will publish shortly Dr. Louis Engel's From Handel to Halle, in a limited edition de luxe (which has already been almost entirely subscribed for) as well as in the ordinary library form. Besides piquant stories and interesting details of the musical world with which the author has been so long connected, it will contain carefully executed engravings of Handel, Gluck, Beethoven, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Mr. Joseph Barnby, Mme. Albani, Prof. Huxley, Mr. Hubert Herkomer, Sir Charles and Lady Halle, Adelina Patti, and the juvenile prodigies, Hofmann and Hegner. Dr. Engel has had the good fortune to induce Prof. Huxley to write a short autobiography. But perhaps the most striking feature in the book will be the long and interesting history of his own life—his early days, his artistic training, pecuniary struggles, and final success—contributed by Mr. Hubert Herkomer.

THE tales contained in Mr. Andrew Lang's Blue Fairy Book have been arranged in a series of reading-books to meet the requirements of the new code, with a number of additional illustrations by Mr. H. J. Ford. They will be published shortly by Messrs. Longmans, in seven volumes, as supplementary to their New Readers.

THE Clarendon Press announce for immediate publication the long-promised edition of Bacon's Essays, by the Rev. S. H. Reynolds.

The Wider Hope is the title of a book on the subject of future punishment shortly to be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. It will consist of a collection of papers written by Archdeacon Farrar, the late Baldwin Brown, and others, including an article by De Quincey which created a sensation many years ago.

MR. G. MANVILLE FENN is engaged upon a sensational newspaper story, for Messrs. Tillotson & Son, to be entitled "A Mint of Money." Messrs. Tillotson are also about to publish a series of sporting novelettes from the pen of Mr. Finch Mason.

MR. FISHER UNWIN has four novels in the press:—Mumford Manor, by Mr. John Adamson; The Old Hall among the Water Meadows, by Miss Rosa Mackenzie Kettle; A Marriage de Convenience, a satirical story told in correspondence, by Mr. C. F. Keary; and a romance of a scriptural cast, entitled The Heart of Sheba.

A NEW edition of E. V. B.'s ever-popular Days and Hours in a Garden, with a fresh preface and introduction, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MR. CARL A. THIMM—late Captain 2nd London Rifles, and perhaps better known as librarian to the International Health Exhibition of 1884—has compiled a bibliography of the art of fence, comprising that of the sword and of the bayonet, duelling, &c., as practised by all European nations, from the earliest period to the present day, with a classified index. It will be published by Messrs. Franz Thimm & Co., of Brook Street.

WE are glad to hear that Mr. James Clegg, of Rochdale, has been encouraged to prepare a third edition of his very useful Directory of Second-hand Booksellers, revised throughout and greatly enlarged. It is intended to be a manual for the public librarian as well as for the private book-buyer.

THE Queen has been pleased to accept the dedication of Mr. Percy Thornton's new book, The Stuart Dynasty, and has presented him with her portrait and autograph.

MR. W. P. COURTNEY has been appointed editor of Murray's Magazine, in succession to Mr. Edward Arnold, who will henceforth devote himself wholly to his publishing business.

THE editorship and business management of the Liverpool Mercury have been made distinct offices since the death of Mr. John Lovell, the former being undertaken by Mr. George Wynne and the latter by Mr. D. W. Hively. Both Mr. Wynne and Mr. Hively held positions under Mr. Lovell.

WHILE Prof. Masson is bringing out month by month the "édition définitif" of De Quincey's Collected Writings (A. & C. Black), which will fill altogether fourteen volumes, another editor with equal claims upon our attention comes forward with two volumes of the Uncollected Writings of the same incomparable essayist (Sonnenschein). This editor is Mr. James Hogg, the son of De Quincey's latest publisher, and himself the intimate confidant of De Quincey in literary matters during the closing years of his life. In fact, not a few of the papers here republished were originally written for the magazines that Mr. James Hogg then edited for his father, the Instructor and its successor which bore the portentous name of Titan. Among these, the most interesting are the review of Froude's History of England; and the series entitled "The English in India," written in the mid-horror of the mutiny, which naturally exercised a special fascination on De Quincey, for his daughter was married to one of the heroes of Delhi, Colonel Baird Smith. By the irony of fate, at least three of the other papers have ceased to be "uncollected" since the present work was announced, for Prof. Masson has already included them in his edition. One or two of the others—translations from the German—have a curious history, in that they have been disinterred from the old London Magazine by help of a private key drawn up by Archdeacon Hesse, son of one of the proprietors. Altogether, these two volumes—while not presenting any features of exceptional literary interest—will not be neglected by those to whom every line of De Quincey is valuable. For frontispiece, there is an etching of the well-known portrait, which seems to have been originally engraved from a daguerrotype for Hogg's Instructor in 1850.

Correction.—In Prof. A. S. Cook's letter on "The Date of the Ruthwell Cross," in the ACADEMY of March 1, for "oe" read "ae" in all cases except in "gidrosted" and "doenid"; and on p. 154, l. 60, for "bughoelda" read "buga, haelda."

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

MR. HALL CAINE has written a short article on "Fiction" for the Contemporary Review.

THE April number of Harper's Magazine will have a paper by Mr. Andrew Lang on "The Merchant of Venice," with ten illustrations by Mr. E. A. Abbey.

THE April number of the English Illustrated Magazine will contain articles on "Rowing at Oxford" and "Rowing at Cambridge," written respectively by Mr. W. H. Grenfell and Mr. R. C. Lehmann. The articles will be fully illustrated with portraits of past and present "Blues." The same number will contain an illustrated paper on Highclere Castle, the seat of the Earl of Carnarvon, by Miss Elizabeth Balch; a short story by the Marchioness of Carmarthen; and contributions by Violet Fane, J. D. Bourchier, Willoughby Maycock, and Hamish MacCunn.

THE April number of the Art Review will contain a paper on "Auguste Rodin," by Eamé Stuart, illustrated by a reproduction of Rodin's well-known "Groupe de Bourgeois de Calais," and his bust of Victor Hugo. Among the other contents will be "Recent German Art Movements," by Dr. Hans Müller; "The Teaching of Drawing in Parisian Municipal Schools," by S. Beale; and an article on Ostrovsky and the Russian drama by Stepniak. The illustrations will include "The Doom of Loki," by John D. Batten, and Holman Hunt's "The Golden Prime of Good Haroun Alraschid."

MR. W. H. ST. JOHN HOPE's "Report upon Kirkstall Abbey" will be published in the April number of the Reliquary. Among other articles to appear in this number are the "Plate in the Tudor Exhibition," by Mr. J. E. Nightingale; "Woodwork in Hanmer Church, destroyed by Fire," by the Rev. Dr. Cox; "Field Names," by Dr. Atkinson; "The Use of the Zeon in the Services of the Greek Church," by Father Hirst; and "Some Pavements at Isurium," by Mr. A. D. Leadman.

THE April number of the Newbery House Magazine will contain the following articles: "The Catacomb of Saint Priscilla," by the Rev. S. Baring Gould, illustrated from sketches taken on the spot; "A Roman Camp in the African Desert," by Mr. D. Ker; "The Little Folks of Ant Land," the first of a series, by Miss Agnes Giberne; and "The Tithe Bill," by His Honour Judge Homersham Cox.

"WHAT DOES THE PRINCE OF WALES DO?" is the title of a paper to appear in the April number of Cassell's Magazine. It will be illustrated with an engraving from a recent photograph, and with views of the study at Marlborough House and the writing-room at Sandringham. The article forms the first of a series on "The Public Life of Public Men."

MR. ARTHUR MACHEN, translator of the "Heptameron" and "Chronicle of Clemendy," will have an article on "Beraalde de Verville" in an early number of the Gentleman's Magazine.

THE Bishop of Ripon will contribute a poem to the April number of the Church Monthly.

A NEW serial story, by Mr. Frank Barrett, entitled "Between Life and Death," will be commenced in next week's issue of Cassell's Saturday Journal (No. 339).

THE forthcoming number of the American Magazine of Poetry will contain an article on Mr. Mackenzie Bell, prefixed to a selection from his poems.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN has promised to deliver an address to the Oxford University Unionist League at the beginning of next term.

A SPECIAL number of the Cambridge University Reporter contains the university accounts for 1889, which fill eighty pages. The total receipts during the year (excluding both the common university fund and trust accounts) amounted to £41,646, the principal items being—rents and dividends, £2342; fees for degrees, £12,268; fines from proctors, £163; fees for matriculations, £5111; fees for examinations, £8021; capitation tax, £10,716. Of the payments, those worthy of notice are—officers, £2170; servants, £785; examiners, £4088; professors, £6264; other officials (readers, &c.), £4773. In view of the recent reduction in the interest on the national debt, it is noteworthy that the university has about £72,000 of its trust funds invested in consols and other government annuities, as compared with about £30,000 invested in municipal and railway securities.

THE inaugural lecture delivered on January 25 by Mr. W. B. Morfill, as reader in Slavonic at Oxford, has been printed under the title An Essay upon the Importance of the Study of the Slavonic Languages. (Henry Frowde.) It consists of a very comprehensive survey of the whole subject. The author first refers to early attempts made in England towards the study of Slavonic, drawing special attention to those in which Oxford was concerned. For example, the first Russian Grammar was printed at Oxford in 1796; and the names of two Russian students appear in the entrance book of Queen's College circa 1760 (we cannot, however, find them in Foster's Alumni Oxonienses). Mr. Morfill then proceeds to point out the advantages to be gained from the study of Slavonic from three several points of view: (1) that of comparative philology, (2) that of literature, and (3) that of practical use. Mr. Morfill by no means limits himself to Russian, but includes in his survey all the Slavonic tongues. Among other topics that he promises to deal with in the future is the work of the Polish poet, Mickiewicz.

A PAPER on "Cambridge Anthropometry," with diagrams, by Dr. J. Venn, is printed in Nature for March 13, in continuation of a previous paper published about two years ago. The results of the two series of investigations now cover nearly 2200 cases. These are divided into three classes: (A) first-class men, (B) second-class men, (C) poll men. The general result is that there is no difference between the physical characteristics of these three classes, except in two respects. First, in the test known as "pull"—a test of the muscular strength of the arms when employed in an action similar to that of pulling a bow—C is distinctly superior to B, and B is almost as much superior to A. This difference Dr. Venn is disposed to attribute, not to any natural physical superiority of C, but merely to greater practice in rowing, cricket, &c. Secondly, in the matter of eyesight, B and still more C have a slight advantage over A. With regard to "head-product" Mr. Francis Galton draws the following conclusions:

- "(1) Although it is pretty well ascertained that in the masses of the population the brain ceases to grow after the age of nineteen, or even earlier, it is by no means so with university students.
- "(2) That men who have obtained high honours have had, on the average, considerably larger brains than others at the age of nineteen.
- "(3) That they have, on the average, larger brains than others, but not to the same extent, at the age of twenty-five; in fact, their predominance is at that time diminished to about one half of what it was.

"(4) Consequently, high honour men are presumably, as a class, both more precocious and more gifted throughout than others. We must therefore look upon eminent university success as largely due to a fortunate combination of these two helpful conditions."

THREE entrance scholarships will be offered at Gonville and Caius College in September for Hebrew, Sanskrit, and mediæval and modern languages. In the examination for the last, alternative papers will be set: (1) in Old French, together with Romance grammar and philology; and (2) in either Old German or Old English, with Teutonic grammar and philology. In Hebrew, the books specified are Genesis and Psalms; and in Sanskrit, Nala and the Hitopadesa.

THE Indian Magazine for March (Kegan Paul & Co.) prints a list of Indians staying in this country, in continuation of a similar list in 1887. About one fourth of the former names reappear; but the total number has increased from 160 to 207. As before, Bombay takes the lead with 63, of whom no less than 44 are Parsis, including one well-known practising barrister, seven engaged in business and seven temporary visitors. Bengal has 53, of whom 35 are Hindus; the Punjab 31, of whom only 5 are Musalmans; the North-West Provinces 20, of whom 14 are Musalmans; Madras only 13, as against only 3 in 1887; the Central Provinces 5, all at Cambridge. Of course, the great majority are in London, studying law or medicine; but there are 10 at Edinburgh, 6 at Glasgow, and 2 at Aberdeen. Of the two great English universities Cambridge has as many as 30, and Oxford only 9. It is also stated that there are more than ten Parsi and Hindu women in England, including girls at school; three of these are engaged in higher study.

THE last number of the Eagle—a magazine supported by members of St. John's College, Cambridge—contains a long obituary of Thomas Ashe, the editor of Coleridge in the "Aldine Poets," and himself the author of several volumes of verse, some of which touch a genuine lyrical note, though tinged with the modern complaint of self-consciousness. There is also here printed, from the college muniment room, the first instalment of some private letters written in the first quarter of the seventeenth century. One of them contains an allusion to the historical Cambridge carrier, Hobson; another describes the state in which the Earl of Arundel, collector of the Arundel marbles, sent his two sons to the university. A valuable feature is the list of Johnians who have died during the past year, though we should suppose it is far from complete except as regards clergymen. The extreme longevity of these is notable.

A LIST has been printed of Cambridge clergymen actively employed in the colonies and India. The total number is 341; and the first five colleges stand thus: St. John's, 75; Trinity, 53; Corpus, 36; Christ's, 25; Jesus, 22.

MR. C. SAPPSWORTH, of St. John's College, Cambridge, who won a first-class in the mediæval and modern languages tripos last year, has been appointed professor of English at the Zürich Polytechnicum.

THE University of Montpellier proposes to celebrate this year its sixth centenary, dating from the bull of Pope Nicholas IV., which constituted a Studium Generale in the faculties of law, medicine, and arts on October 26, 1289. The celebration has been fixed to take place in the third week of May, and President Carnot has promised to be present.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

AT DAWN.

SHE only knew the birth and death
Of days, when each that died
Was still at morn a hope, at night
A hope unsatisfied.

The dark trees shivered to behold
Another day begin;
She, being hopeless, did not weep
As the grey dawn came in.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE notes on Holy Wells, by Mr. R. C. Hope, are continued in the Antiquary for March. It is almost new ground, and every paragraph is of interest. We should not have guessed that the practice of using the waters of Buxton for medicinal purposes could ever have been thought a superstitious rite; but Mr. Hope prints a letter from Sir William Bassett to Cromwell, Henry VIII.'s vicar-general, in which he informs his employer that he had "locked and sealed the baths and wells at Buxton, that none shall enter to wash there till your Lordship's pleasure be further known." It appears that there is—or was—a St Helen's Well in Derby. Why the mother of Constantine should so often have been selected as the patroness of wells we do not know. It seems, however, to be by no means an uncommon dedication. There is one at Twizell in Northumberland, another at Louth, and a third at Brigg in Lincolnshire. The Rev. Joseph Hirst contributes a learned paper on archaeological work in Greece. Canon Scott Robinson's paper on Archbishop Laud in the Tower is worthy of notice. Whatever view we may take of Laud's character, he was in his day a character of sufficient prominence to render every new fact concerning him of value. The Hon. George Wrottesley gives us more pedigrees from the plea-rolls. Though from the nature of the case they are fragmentary, they will be of great value to genealogists.

AN agreeable "Cauchemar d'un Bibliophile" by that artist in nightmares, M. Robida, will recommend the March Libre Moderne to the superficial turner-over of things; and those who are more solidly disposed will find plenty of matter to read. The scale and plan of the new venture makes it less easy to notice particular articles than it was in the old Libre; but, from the same causes, the periodical has become more readable, as a whole, by more persons.

THE Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for January and February appears under one cover. The principal contents are a description of the monastery of Santa Fe in Toledo, by Riu y Cabanas, showing late mudéjar work and Arabic inscriptions. The archaeological researches of Catalina Garcia in Cifuentes tell of a curious kind of mutual insurance against losses in war in 1299, and furnish an example of a fine Romanesque church-porch constructed 1262-68. A curious trait of Spanish manners occurs in the Cortes of Madrid (1632-36), by Manuel Danvila: four balconies are granted to the Procuradores and Secretaries whence to see the Auto de fe. Money is also voted for the foundation of a college of Irishmen in Madrid. It is found at last to be easier and cheaper to raise money directly from the cities and towns than through the intervention of Cortes and the paid Procuradores. A curious silver ring, with Keltiberian inscription, from Lerida, is described by Puyol y Campo. Father Fita prints some documents, and gives interesting details, about the last Bishop of Morocco.

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for March contains a review of Prof. Robertson Smith's Religion of the Semites, by Dr. Oort, valuable rather as stimulating to a thorough testing of the revolutionary conclusions of that admirably-written work than as advancing the study of Semitic religion. Dr. Land gives a useful sketch of Mandæan religion, on the basis of a recent work by Brandt; Dr. Houtama discusses the daily Calds of the Mohammedans; and Dr. Hoekstra makes a new attempt to explain "baptism for the dead" (1 Cor. xv. 29, 30). We should also mention Dr. Berlage's discriminating review of Pfeiderer's Das Urchristenthum, which is sometimes wrongly represented as the last word of liberal theology.

THE MARLOWE MEMORIAL.

MAY I be allowed to make a further appeal to the readers of the ACADEMY on behalf of the Marlowe memorial?

It is now more than eighteen months ago since it was pointed out that in no place in England did any memorial exist to the creator of our noble Elizabethan drama. An influential committee was then formed, with Lord Coleridge as chairman. This committee, after careful consideration of the various proposals submitted, finally decided to erect a piece of statuary on some site at Canterbury—Marlowe's native-place. A prospectus was accordingly issued, inviting subscriptions from all those who loved Marlowe's work and desired to do honour to his name. The result so far has been not discouraging. But the committee, believing that the time has drawn near when their work should come to a conclusion, make a fresh appeal for subscriptions, in the hope that those who have not yet subscribed may at once be persuaded to do so. The committee have no hesitation in informing the public that, unless a response is made to this appeal, the memorial cannot be worthy of the reputation of the poet to whom they desire to render homage.

I do not think there is any necessity for me to enter into any defence of Marlowe's claims to such a memorial, or to attempt to "draw the curtain of time, and show the picture of genius." This has been frequently done of late by several writers in our newspapers and reviews, and just recently in the Revue des Deux Mondes, by M. Texte, who strikes the true note of suggestive thought when he says Marlowe "found time to state the problem of the destiny of man, and to ennoble the theatre of his day by putting it upon the stage." Still, I may mention that the committee wish to erect an artistic monument to commemorate Marlowe's genius, because he was the first of Englishmen who fully perceived the latent capabilities of the decasyllabic metre, and, by his strong but delicate manipulation of it, showed the powerful, sensuous, and exquisite music that could be evoked from it; and because, as stated in the prospectus already alluded to, he is one of the most original of the majestic series of the English poets, and the creator of English drama in each of its principal branches.

Subscriptions may be sent to the hon. treasurer, Mr. Sidney Lee, 18, Edwardes-square, Kensington, W.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THOMAS ROWLEY.

Cambridge: March 19, 1890.

I wish to draw attention to what I believe to be a new point with respect to Thomas Rowley.

We have Chatterton's authority for the statement that he was a priest. I feel very doubtful as to this, and suspect that he was a layman.

We have, in English Guilds (ed. Toulmin Smith, p. 420), an account of the Office of the Mayor of Bristol, in which certain chantry-priests are mentioned. Among these we find "William Canynges preestes, John Shipwardes preste, and Thomas Rowley is preste"; where "Rowley is" would now be spelt "Rowley's."

Was it usual for priests to know their own business so badly that they were in the habit of appointing chantry-priests to pray for their souls? Or may we not rather suppose that chantry-priests were usually appointed by laymen? It seems to me probable that Chatterton may have met with some such mention of Rowley as that given above, and may have misunderstood it to mean that Rowley was a priest himself.

An obvious criticism is that, had he done so, he would have supposed Canynge to be a priest also, whereas he is usually styled a merchant. Precisely so; and for this very reason Chatterton oddly describes him as "William Canynge, of Bristol, merchant," in one place (Aldine edition of Chatterton, ii. 296); and in another place as "Sir William Canynge, dean of St. George's College, at Westbury-on-Trim, and Knight Templar of St. John of Jerusalem" (id. p. 299); and again, in the same passage, mentions "Sir Thomas Rowley, priest, prepositor, chaplain, chanon, and Knight Templar of St. John of Jerusalem"; and yet again (p. 298) speaks of "William Canynge and Thomas Rowley, ecclesiastical Knights Templars of St. John of Jerusalem." Then, in order to reconcile the facts of William Canynge being both a "merchant" and a "priest," he tells us how "Mr. Cannings" was "prepaid" for orders on a Friday, "ordaynd the next day, the daie of St. Mathew, and on Sunday sung his first mass in the church of our ladie." This wonderful event (for so I regard it) took place "in the year Kyng Edward came to Bristow"; see Warton, Hist. E. P., 1840, ii. 356. See also the same, p. 350, where the visit of Edward IV. to Bristol is dated either 1462 (when St. Matthew's day fell on a Tuesday, not on a Saturday) or 1463 (when it fell on a Wednesday). He was again at Bristol in 1472 (when it fell on a Monday).

It seems to me that we have here a hint as to how Chatterton came to imagine that both Rowley and Canynge were priests. Canynge was a well-known man, four times mayor of Bristol, and I presume that there is no authentic record which tells us of his taking orders in order to avoid marriage; though, on this point, I am open to correction. And I suspect that there is, similarly, no real authority to show that Rowley was ever a priest at all.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

A SPEECH ATTRIBUTED TO OLIVER CROMWELL.

Oxford: March 17, 1890.

In an article in a recent number of Sybel's Historische Zeitschrift, Dr. Wolfgang Michael discusses Cromwell's expulsion of the Long Parliament, and prints a speech which he believes to have been spoken by Cromwell on that occasion. People often lament, says Dr. Michael, that the actual speech made by Cromwell in Parliament on April 20, 1653, has not come down to us; but, as a matter of fact, there is a report of that speech extant (though neither Carlyle nor any other historian mentions it), and it is printed in the Annual Register for 1767. He then discusses the authenticity of the speech in question, and gives a translation of it at length. The speech runs as follows:

"Spoken by O.C. when he put an end to the Long Parliament."

"It is high time for me to put an end to your sitting in this place, which ye have dishonoured by your contempt of all virtue, and defiled by your practice of every vice. Ye are a factious crew, and enemies to all good government. Ye are a pack of mercenary wretches, and would—like Esau—sell your country for a mess of pottage, and—like Judas—betray your God for a few pieces of money. Is there a single virtue now remaining amongst you? Is there one vice ye do not possess? Ye have no more religion than my horse. Gold is your God. Which of you have not bartered away your consciences for bribes? Is there a man amongst you that hath the least care for the good of the commonwealth? Ye sordid prostitutes! have ye not defiled this sacred place, and turned the Lord's temple into a den of thieves? By your immoral principles and wicked practices ye are grown intolerably odious to the whole nation. You, who were deputed here by the people to get their grievances redressed, are yourselves become their greatest grievance.

"Your country, therefore, calls upon me to cleanse this Augean stable by putting a final period to your iniquitous proceedings in this house, and which, by God's help, and the strength He hath given me, I am now come to do. I command you, therefore, upon peril of your lives, to depart immediately out of this place. Go! Get you out! Make haste! Ye venal slaves, begone! Boh! Take away that shining bauble there, and lock up the door."

Dr. Michael finds internal evidence for the genuineness of this speech in the resemblances which exist between it and other recorded utterances of Cromwell's. For instance, he charges the Parliament with corruption, says it is high time to put an end to their sitting, urges that the best interests of the country oblige him to do so, and terms the mace a bauble. All these ideas and expressions, argues Dr. Michael, may be found either in Cromwell's own speeches or in contemporary accounts of this incident.

Other evidence of authenticity he finds in the account of the source of the speech which is given in the Annual Register. The editor of that work prefixes this note to the speech:

"The following piece is said to have been found lately among some papers that formerly belonged to Oliver Cromwell; and is supposed to be a copy of the very words which he spoke to the members of the Long Parliament when he turned them out of the house. It is communicated by a person who signs his name T. Ireton, and says the paper is marked with the following words: 'Spoken by O.C. when he put an end to the Long Parliament.'"

(Annual Register, 1767, 5th ed., London. 1796. Appendix to the Chronicle, p. 212.)

It is obvious that Dr. Michael has not appreciated the full significance of those words in the editor's note which are here printed in italics. The editor declines to guarantee the genuineness of the speech, and carefully lets his readers know that he has never seen the original. Moreover, even though some of the sentiments expressed in the speech coincide with views actually expressed by Cromwell, the style does not in the least resemble that of any of Cromwell's speeches, or that of any speeches of the period.

The fact is Dr. Michael has accepted as a serious historical document what is in reality a political squib directed against the corruption of the House of Commons of 1767. Its object was plain enough at the time when it was published. On December 9, 1768,

"Col. Onslow acquainted the House of Commons that he had taken down a paper of a seditious nature, which a man had stuck up at the corner of Bond-street, and which the mob were haranguing upon the contents of. It pretended to be the speech of Oliver Cromwell, when he came to the House of Commons and turned the members out of doors. He had taken up a man, one Dennis Shade, who said he had stuck it up by the direction of one Thornton, a milk seller. He had had the man apprehended and committed to prison, and hoped by this means, that he should be able to trace it to its source."

The paper was then read, and a brief debate on it took place (Sir Henry Cavendish's Debates, i. 100). On the following day Shade and Thornton were brought to the bar; and the House passed a resolution that Joseph Thornton, having hired Dennis Shade "to affix, in a public place in the town, a seditious and infamous paper, entitled 'The Speech of Oliver Cromwell at the dissolution of the Long Parliament,' with a view of inflaming the minds of the people at this time," had been guilty of a breach of privilege and should be committed to Newgate (Commons Journals, xxxii. pp. 97, 99). On the 20th of the same month Thornton, having apologised and petitioned for release, was reprimanded and discharged (ibid. 113, 116).

The proceedings recorded in the Journals throw no light on the authorship of the paper, and on this point I can only offer a conjecture. It is evident, I think, that the author must have been a person who was interested in Cromwell and his times, and had a considerable knowledge of both. He must also have been a person of advanced political views, who felt very strongly about the corruption of the House of Commons. One man, who was a frequent contributor to the newspapers about this time, combines these two qualifications in a very marked degree. I am inclined to suggest that the contributor to the Annual Register, the "person who signs his name T. Ireton," ought to have signed his name T. Hollis. Thomas Hollis, as his biography printed in 1780 shows, was a Whig whose Whiggism had developed into Republicanism. He felt so strongly about the corruption of the House of Commons that he refused to enter it, because he could only do so by means of corruption (Life, i. 103, 205, 322). His admiration for Cromwell he showed in many ways, but most conspicuously by his presentation of Cooper's portrait of the Protector to Sidney Sussex College, which took place in 1766 (Life, i. 298).

I offer this suggestion merely as a plausible conjecture, for the question of the authorship of the speech is of no importance. But that it is necessary to show that it has no claim to authenticity Dr. Michael's mistake seems to prove.

A LEGEND OF ABRAHAM.

London: March 11, 1890.

Dr. B. Beer, in his Leben Abraham's nach Auffassung der Jüdischen Sage (Leipzig, 1859, p. 3), translates from the Talmud the following account of the way in which Abraham attained to the knowledge of the true God:

"Als er sie [d. h. die Hölle] zum erstenmale verließ, den Himmel über sich und die Erde um sich her erblickend, begann er nachzusinnen, wer wohl dies Alles erschaffen haben möge. Eben ging die Sonne auf in ihrer Pracht, da dachte er, diese müsse der Schöpfer des Weltalls sein, wart sich vor ihr nieder und betete sie an den ganzen Tag. Doch der Abend kam, die Sonne sank und Abraham meinte jetzt, dies könne wohl der Urheber des Alls nicht sein! Der Mond erhob sich nun im Osten und ein zahlreiches Sternengeheer ward sichtbar. 'Wahrlich, der Mond ist der Herr des Weltalls und die Sterne sind seiner Diener Schaar,' rief Abraham nun aus, neigte sich vor dem Monde und betete ihn an. Aber auch der Mond ging unter, der Sterne Glanz erblüht, und die Sonne erschien wieder am Saume des Horizonts. Da sagte er: 'Wahrlich, diese Himmelskörper allesamt können das Weltall nicht erschaffen haben, sie gehorchen nur einem unsichtbaren Gebieter, dem Alles sein Dasein verdankt; da allein werde ich anbeten fortan und vor ihm mich neigen!'"

This legend is also found in Josephus, Antiq. of the Jews, i. 7, and in the Qur'an, sura vi. 74. It has been popularised in Germany by Herder, (W. z.-schönen Lit. u. K. ix. 40), and in England by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould (Legends of Old Testament Characters, i. 173).

It is also referred to by an Irish writer of the end of the seventh century, namely, Muirchu, the author of the memoir of S. Patrick, published in the Anecdota Bollandiana, 1882, and in the Rolls edition of the Tripartite Life, pp. 269-301, 494-498. Muirchu's words are:

"Quaerebat [scil. Monelsen Saxonissa] namque per naturam totius creaturæ factorem, in hoc patriarchæ Abraham secuta exemplum."

The question then arises, how did Muirchu learn the legend? I am told by the Rev. Thomas Olden that, according to Dr. Schiller-Szinessy, the legend was known to the Jews in the West of Europe, and therefore to the Gentiles also, as early as the fifth century. But the Irish Gentiles do not appear to have come in contact with the Jews before the latter half of the eleventh century. At the year 1079 (1062 according to O'Connor) the Annals of Inisfallen (Rawl. B. 503, fo. 28a, 2) contain the following entry:

"Coicer Iudaide do thichtain dar muir 7 aiscoda leo do Thairdelbach 7 a ndichor doridiel dar muir."

Which means, "Five Jews came over sea, having presents for Toirdelbach [Hua Briain], and they were expelled over sea again"—the presents, doubtless, not being returned.

It seems probable, at all events possible, that Muirchu learned the legend in question from reading Josephus. Was there an early Latin translation of the Ἰουδαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία, or did Muirchu, like his countryman, Johannes Sootus Brigena, understand Greek?

WHITLEY STOKES.

AN OLD ITALIAN PLAYBILL.

Florence: March 10, 1890.

Several works treating on the history of the Italian comic theatre in the eighteenth and early part of the present century have lately been published both in England and Italy; and, as an old playbill of the Pavone theatre still existing at Perugia has just come into my possession, perhaps a translation of it may interest some readers of the ACADEMY.

"In Perugia during the ensuing spring of this year 1808, at the theatre of the Pavone, belonging to the Casino of the nobility, a company of comic artists, under the direction of Antonio Previtali and Giovanni Battista Pavoni, will give a series of thirty subscription recitals, with the usual two reserved for the impresa. The majority of the performances will possess the charm of novelty, and consist of tragedies, and dramas, spectacular, and character plays. In addition a variety of musical farces will be given in the French style [Farsette in Musica al Costume Francese]. The directors hope, in conjunction with their comic troop, to obtain that sympathetic consideration which they have received in the principal cities of Italy. Study, exactness, and precision, rich dresses, new scenery, and splendid decorations will all be scrupulously supplied; and, in so far as they may fall in proportion to your deserts, oh! intelligent population! you will supplement them with your clemency and pardon—inborn ornaments of your noble hearts."

A list of thirty-three names follows, including the Stentarello and other mask characters peculiar to Italian comedy. The prices of admission (given in scudi and bajocchi) to subscribers are, for the nobility, equal to ten francs; for ordinary citizens, seven and a half francs; for artisans, five francs; and for servants, the same. Each separate performance is only half a franc for an aristocrat, and of course at diminishing rates for the others, until the stranger is classed; and he is inhospitably expected to pay one franc, that is twice as much as was levied on the most distinguished resident patron.

The noteworthy passage in this playbill is the promise to present "Farsette in Musica al Costume Francese," which probably refers to the introduction into Italy of the French Vaudeville. Three years earlier it is on record that Buonaparte, when assembling his forces, at Boulogne for the invasion of England, did not omit to collect a troop of actors under Barré, which bore for title "The London Company of Vaudevillists." Its services were not immediately wanted there!

The old form of Italian comedy, which had flourished in France since 1716 under the directorship of Luigi Andrea Riccoconi, lost its popularity, and was suppressed in 1779 by a decree of the Council of State. Signor Ademollo, in his Famiglia di Comici Italiani nel Secolo decimottavo, tells of the talented Carlo Bertinazzi, who was permitted to remain in Paris after the dissolution of the Italian company. He was in such high favour that a fancy breed of dogs is called Carlin from his name. This representative Arlecchino died of apoplexy in 1783; and one of many proofs of public admiration remains in the quatrain:

De Carlin pour peindre le sort,
Tres-peu de mots doivent suffire,
Toute sa vie il a fait rire,
Il a fait pleurer à sa mort.

Goldoni scotched, if he did not quite kill, Arlecchino and masquerade; at least Voltaire so said, when he, in 1760, congratulated him on having "liberated Italy from the Goths." But Arlecchino, much shorn, still survives in English pantomime; and the risky lazzi of Stentarello and Pulcinello convulse Italians with laughter to this day.

Vaudeville, so called from Val de Vire in Normandy, its birthplace, suited the French taste better; and one of their writers says "Le Français né malin forma le Vaudeville agréable, indiscret," &c.

The two queens of the house of Medici had familiarised Italian comedy in France long before 1716, the Italian language being made by their influence fashionable at court. The effeminate Henri III. (1577) and Louis XIII. (1639) were strenuous supporters of Italian favourite comedians, and protected them even when, as in 1577, their performances were so grossly licentious as to require a stop put to them for a time.

8 p.m. Browning: "The Beautiful Common-places of Browning," by Mrs. De Courcy Laffan.

9 p.m. Royal Institution: "Foam," by Lord Rayleigh.

SATURDAY, March 29, 8 p.m. Royal Institution: "Electricity and Magnetism," VII., by Lord Rayleigh.

8 p.m. Society of Arts: "The Atmosphere," IV., by Prof. Vivian Lewes.

SCIENCE.

SOME BOOKS ON ELECTRICITY.

THE "CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES."—Electricity in Modern Life. By G. W. de Tunzelmann. (Walter Scott.) The second volume of this series, if hardly as suggestive as the first, contains—as dealing with a quantitative science—less of mediaeval methods of thought. It will hardly give rise to controversy, and will probably find many readers, although scarcely among professed scientists. It does not deal with the modern theory of electricity, which we see is to be the subject of another volume of the series, presumably by Prof. Fitzgerald. Mr. Tunzelmann devotes only nineteen pages to electric and magnetic theories; and he springs from electrification as a condition to electricity as an entity (on p. 2) with a rapidity which reminds us forcibly of the devil in Lessing's Faust, who was as quick as thought in changing from good to evil. Indeed, Mr. Tunzelmann shows evidence in his brief theoretical discussion of impatience to reach the practical applications, the pictures, and the historical notices. Probably most of his readers will be equally impatient, either knowing all that he has to say in these two preliminary chapters, or else quite ready to take it on faith—like the young gentleman from Balliol who assumed the higher mathematics in order to pass at once to their applications to supernatural religion. It is to the chapters on the telephone, on electric lighting, and on telegraphy that the general reader will turn with most interest; and these appear to be clearly and carefully done, if the space allotted to them is necessarily small. Mr. Tunzelmann has not forgotten to introduce chapters also on electricity in war and on medical electricity. The latter chapter is somewhat brief; and a more extended account of the mechanical appliances by which the electric light is made available for internal examination in medicine, or electro-motive force is used in dentistry, might well have been included. While electricity can be of service in prolonging life, Mr. Tunzelmann, on the other hand, deprecates its application as a means of terminating it. Perhaps this is a point for scientific agnosticism till the private experiments of weary mortals on electric light cables have determined the question of its possible efficiency for criminal purposes. On the whole, Mr. Tunzelmann has written a readable little book, and we wish it every success.

Potential, and its Application to the Explanation of Electrical Phenomena popularly treated. By Dr. Tumirz. Translated by D. Robertson. (Livingtons.) We do not know this book in the original; but the translator appears to have closely followed it, and, presumably out of a feeling of piety towards the writer, has neither corrected nor drawn attention to the appalling blunder on p. 3! The statements as to force, attraction, work, &c., do not seem to us given with peculiar clearness; and we think the translator might have easily written as good a book de novo. However, it is clearly printed, and may be of service to junior students in the local university colleges, and to the higher forms in schools, if teachers, before allowing their pupils to get a sight of it, adopt the plan of the Russian government and ink out effectually the obnoxious third page.

Absolute Measurements in Electricity and Magnetism. By Andrew Gray. (Macmillan.) This book stands on a higher plane than the other works on elementary electricity to which we have referred in this article; and we cordially recommend it to all students of electricity and magnetism who are not sufficiently advanced to fully profit by the author's larger work on the same subject. The chapter on units has been distinctly improved; and our sole ground of complaint now is the smallness of the type and the poorness of the paper as compared with the same publishers' Hydrostatics recently noticed in the ACADEMY. The book had, no doubt, to be handy for laboratory use; but we would gladly have spared the eighty-eight pages of advertisements for the sake of a more readable type.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE YENISSEI INSCRIPTIONS.

Barton-on-Humber: March 11, 1890.

I will next (vide ACADEMY, February 8, 1890, p. 103) give some illustrations of the language of the Inscriptions, which is, I think, undoubtedly Monggholian, but includes certain words from allied dialects. I cannot reproduce the script here; but the values of most of the letters are clear enough. As appears from the account of the finders, many of the Inscriptions are mortuary, though the dead commemorated may have been buried elsewhere. The spelling is by no means regular, and the word-division at times inaccurate; but the variants are useful in supplying a list of equivalents; and the two special Mon. interpunction-signs (=) and (· · ·) occur, though not so frequently as (:). Searching for "grave," I came on the form:

1. X-k-s—k-sX: os-i (Ins. i. 1).
2. X-k-s—sX-os-i (Ins. xxii. 3).
3. X-k-s—sX-os-h (Ins. viii. 2).
4. X-k-s—sX-os (Ins. xii. 1).
5. X-k-i—sX-os (Ins. iii. 1).
6. X-s—kh-os-i (Ins. v. 12).
7. X-s—kh-os (Ins. v. 2).
8. X-s—khX-a (Ins. v. 4).
9. X-k-s—ksX (Ins. xx. 2).
10. ks—k-s (Ins. xvii. 5).

This archaic word χσιχσος or χσιχσος is the Ancient Mon. (ap. Strahlenberg)	Oh-os-sk-os-r	} = "grave."

Modern Mong. (ap. Schmidt)	k-s-k-ö-r (-on)
Tchagatai	o'-u-k-u-r
Buriat	k-u-s-s-ng
	x-u-s-s-ng

In the Yenissei word the final consonant may have fallen off, as in the Buriat auc'e (cf. Mon. tzolo-n, tzolo); but most of the forms probably represent case-flexion, a and e being dat. and Locat. endings, and i the ac. ending. Archaic forms are very frequently longer than later forms; and words are spun out (e.g., Bab. Na-na-a=Nana) by the principle of "vocalic support" and otherwise; while, at the same time (as in the Etruscan inscriptions) vowels are constantly omitted.

The above form will probably be thought a decisive illustration of the language; but I may mention the Yenissei zeluoc, ziluoc, zelu, which = the Mon. tzolo ("rock," "stone"); and a word of frequent occurrence, which I transliterate xyt = the Mon. txi, tsi, si, "thou." Abaga, perhaps originally oeboegoe, I have already mentioned. The Yenissei initial a-form is very interesting, being at once unique, so far as I know, and at the same time most clearly derived from the Runic othil (o, oe). Mon. uses special initial, medial, and final forms for some letters.

The Inscriptions must commemorate someone, and, in the abstract, the most probable persons are Djingghiz ("The Very-mighty"—i.e., "ding, 'great,' + ghiz, the superlative." Prof. Lacouperie) Khan and the great princes of his house, especially since we find "the Mongols worshipping as good deities the princely souls of Genghis Khan's family, at whose head stands the divine Genghis himself" (Tylor, Prim. Cult., ii. 107). Now the form ü-k-i-t:oe-l or oukouteé occurs at least four times in the Inscriptions (i. 2; vii. 1; xii. 1; xvii. 6), and there can be little or no doubt about the reading, for the u, k, t, and oe are Runic letters; apparently the u (ou) and e are lengthened by doubling the signs, a process in perfect accordance with the archaic practice of marking the plural by reduplication (cf. Ak. khar-khar, "hollows"; Malay orang-orang, "people"). Ükütöe I propose to read as Ükhöte, commonly, but not so correctly, called Ogotai, the third son and the successor of Djingghiz; he ruled A.D. 1229-41, and his sway extended from Kamtchatka to Hungary. If this view be correct, we obtain A.D. 1300 as an approximate date for the Inscriptions, which allows ample time for the Runes to have spread northeastwards as far as Yenissei. It was in the thirteenth century that the Mongghols under Djingghiz borrowed the Uighur script, which the latter people had obtained from the Aramean, through the Estranghelo and Nestorian; and in 1269, by order of the great Khubilai Khan, they further adopted the Pasespa script, a Tibetan variant of one of the forms of the Indian alphabet. But the use of this latter writing ceased in about a century; and it thus probably affords an exact parallel to the adoption and cesser of a Runic script (combined with some other letters) in the North. The Mongghols were extremely receptive, and were always prepared to take from their neighbours anything that was good; and, on the whole, it is not probable that the far North would produce such literary efforts as these Inscriptions prior to the time of Djingghiz.

I need scarcely add that the above results are tentative and subject to correction, nor need I further refer to the difficulties of the investigation, which have evidently been felt by the experts engaged in it to be very great. I propose, on a future occasion, to examine some other words and forms occurring in the Inscriptions.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE anniversary meeting of the Chemical Society will be held on Thursday next, March 27, at 4 p.m. The members and their friends will dine together at the Whitehall Rooms, Hotel Metropole, on the evening of the same day.

THE subject of Lord Rayleigh's Friday evening discourses at the Royal Institution next week will be "Foam."

UNDER the title of Dogs, Jackals, Wolves and Foxes, Mr. R. H. Porter will shortly publish, in a limited edition, a monograph of the Canidae, by Prof. St. George Mivart, illustrated with forty-four coloured plates, drawn from nature and hand-coloured by Mr. J. G. Keulemans. The work will contain a description of the habits, geographical distribution, and life-history of every species which the author thinks can fairly claim to be regarded as distinct, and also of various marked varieties of what he regards as probably single species. In addition, a copious introduction, enriched with woodcuts, will treat of the anatomy of the entire group, of the structural relations of the Canidae to other animals, of their position in zoological classification, and of the general relations they bear to the past and present history of the earth. The origin of the domestic dog will also be considered.

AT the last meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Mr. W. Bateson read a paper on "Some Skulls of Egyptian Mummied Cats." Six skulls and two restored heads of Egyptian mummy-cats were shown, in illustration of the early history of the domestication of the cat. The specimens indicate that the cats embalmed by the Egyptians were of at least two kinds, and that the larger variety was of much greater size than that usually reached by either the modern domestic cat or the wild cat of Europe. These facts have been already pointed out by de Blainville and Nehring; but, on comparison with a series of modern skulls, it is not possible to support the attempt to refer these animals to any particular species of cat. The presumption is rather that cats of many kinds and sizes, possibly distinct, and probably including Felis serval and F. caligata (? F. maniculata and F. caffra), were all thus embalmed; but whether these animals were all domesticated, or whether some were merely collected from time to time, there is no evidence to show. Pupa-cases of the maggots which had lived in these heads were also exhibited.

INDIAN JOTTINGS.

MR. H. H. RISLEY, of the Bengal Civil Service, has written a paper for an early number of the Contemporary Review, entitled, "The Race Basis of Political Movements in India." He advocates a scheme for the gradual introduction of the representative principle, founded upon the results of his elaborate researches into the ethnology of Bengal, which will shortly be published by the government in four volumes. He also incorporates his more recent studies in Hanover, with the assistance of Herr Von Beningsen and others, of the Prussian Selbstverwaltung arrangements.

MR. S. ARTHUR STRONG is preparing an edition, with translation and notes, of a Hebrew treatise on the religious ceremonies, feasts, and fast-days, &c., of the Jews of Malabar, from a MS. in the Jews' College, London, written towards the end of the last century.

THE Maharaja of Vizianagram—to whom Prof. Max Müller has already been indebted for pecuniary assistance in publication—has undertaken to defray the cost of printing a dictionary of terms employed in Hindu medical works, which has been compiled by Kaviraja U. C. Kaviratna, librarian of the Sanskrit College at Calcutta.

MR. GEORGE A. GRIERSON, of the Bengal Civil Service—joint author with Dr. Hoernle of that scholarly work, The Comparative Dictionary of the Bihari Language (of which Part II. has just been published at Calcutta), and compiler of that exhaustive repository entitled Bihar Peasant Life (Trübner, 1885)—has now issued a third book worthy to be compared with those. This is a paper on "The Modern Vernacular Literature of Hindustan," which is published as a special number of the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. In form, we have here a catalogue of all the authors, 952 in number, who have written in the various vernaculars of Northern India since Prakrit was superseded as a spoken language some seven centuries ago. They are arranged in chronological order, beginning with the bards of Rajputana, the main source for early Hindu history. Descended from these is the Muhammadan author of the Padmāvat, who allegorised Rajput legends after the fashion of Bunyan's Holy War. Then come the rival schools of religious poetry, who celebrate Vishnu under his two forms as Krishna and Rāma. The latter culminated in Tulsi Dās, whose version of the Rāmāyana is described by Mr. Grierson as "the Bible of a hundred millions of people." An English translation of it was published, in handsome form, by Mr. F. S. Growse, in 1883 (Allahabad). The catalogue is continued down to the present time, the most notable recent features being the production of anthologies, the introduction of the printing press, and the rise of the Hindi drama. Mr. Grierson's work, which fills more than 200 pages, is illustrated with facsimiles of native MSS. and miniatures, and concludes with three indexes—of persons, of works, and of places.

WE have received the first volume of a new series of the Archaeological Survey of India, under the editorship of Dr. James Burgess. As opposed to the former series of Reports, associated with the name of General Cunningham, the aim of the new one is to reproduce the monuments with scientific accuracy, accompanied by a plain statement of historical and architectural facts. The present volume deals in the main with Jaunpur, now an unimportant town in the North-West Provinces not far from Benares and Allahabad, but known in history as the capital of an independent Muhammadan dynasty in the fifteenth century. The architectural remains here consist of a ruined fort, a very beautiful bridge of late date, and a series of mosques in fair preservation, all built in a peculiar style. The greater part of the volume is devoted to a description of these mosques, illustrated with photographs, elevations, ground plans, and ornamental details. Apart from their special character both of plan and architecture, their chief interest consists in the fact that they were undoubtedly erected by Hindu workmen out of the materials of Hindu or Buddhist temples. In not a few cases the Hindu builders have actually carved their own names on the walls. The drawings, which fill more than seventy plates, were made by Mr. E. W. Smith, with native assistance; the letter-press has been written by Dr. A. Führer, who has also added notes on the ancient sites of Bhūila-Tal and Sahet-Mahet. The former has been identified with Kapilavastu, the birthplace of Gautama Buddha; but this is strenuously denied by Dr. Führer. The latter is admitted to be the ancient Sravasti; and an inscription recently found shows that Buddhism lingered on here so late as A.D. 1219. Many Jain relics have also been discovered. It is much to be desired that the Government should take advantage of the munificent offer of the Maharani of Barmampur to undertake a comprehensive excavation of the spot.

PROF. JAMES DARMESTETER has just published, through the Société Asiatique (Paris: Leroux), his long-expected work upon the Popular Songs of the Afghans, of which an anticipation appeared some two years ago in the Contemporary Review. The work is divided into three parts: the text of the songs, 116 in number, which the author collected on the Afghan frontier in 1886, classified according to their subject—history, religion, romance, love, customs and folklore; (2) a translation, with a philological and historical commentary, forming a kind of encyclopædia of Afghan life; (3) an introduction, dealing with the language, history, and literature of the Afghans, in which the author gives the results of his researches. The section on the language is based on the same plan as M. Darmesteter's Historical Persian Grammar. His conclusion is that Pushtu (the language of the Afghans) is not—as has been commonly thought—intermediate between India and Persia, but purely and exclusively Iranian, being derived from the Zend of Arachosia. As regards history, M. Darmesteter traces the origin of the Afghans back to the time of Alexander; and he also describes the organisation of their schools of popular poetry.

M. DARMESTETER has also read a paper before the Académie des Inscriptions upon the great Persian inscription at Kandahar, so often mentioned by travellers, but never before copied. M. Darmesteter obtained his copy of it, through Lieut. William Archer, from the native letter-writer to the Indian government at Kandahar. The inscription is in two parts. The first part is dated A.D. 1522, having been engraved by the Emperor Baber to commemorate his capture of the city on his way to the invasion of India. The second part, which was written in 1598, contains a history of the city from the time of Baber to that of Akbar, and also a list of the provinces and chief towns of the Mogul empire.

In a late number of the Journal of the Bengal Asiatic Society, Mr. Vincent Smith and Dr. Hoernle describe an ancient seal found at Bithari, in Ghazipur district of the North-Western Provinces, well-known for its stone pillar with an inscription of Skanda Gupta. This seal bears on the upper part, in relief, a representation of Garuda, the human-faced bird-monster which was the emblem of the Gupta dynasty. Below is an inscription giving the genealogy of the Gupta kings (with their queens) for nine generations, ending with Kumara Gupta II., the owner of the seal. Hitherto, only seven Gupta kings were known, from coins and inscriptions; but the dynasty is now carried down to about A.D. 550.

In the last part of the Numismatic Chronicle for last year, Mr. E. Thurston, describes fifteen Roman aurei lately discovered at Vinukonda, in Madras. They date from Tiberius to Caracalla; and, as with previous finds, they are in good preservation.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Senart exhibited reproductions of some Graeco-Indian statues, discovered by Capt. Deane in the course of excavations at Sikri, in the valley of the Kabul river. One of them represents an absolutely new type of Buddha, emaciated by the austerities to which he subjected himself before attaining perfect knowledge. M. Senart also referred to an inscription published in the Indian Antiquary of September, 1889, which was found on a sculptured fragment of Graeco-Indian style. Owing to the inadequacy of the facsimile, he was unable to regard the date as certain. M. Senart proceeded to make some general remarks upon the influence which classical art exercised upon India. In his opinion, Mr. James Fergusson has brought too low the date of many of the Graeco-Indian monuments in the north-west of India. M. Senart maintained that the chief intermediary was the Hellenism of the Arsacides; and that the period when Western influence upon Indian art was most marked was the first and second century A.D., during the reign of Kanishka (Kanerkas) and his successors.

WE have received volume x. no. 35 of the Journal of the Ceylon Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society, which, though dated 1889, contains the papers of the last two months of 1887. Perhaps the most interesting are the historical ones, which describe the capture of Trincomalee by the Dutch in 1639, and give a Belgian physician's notes on Ceylon in 1687-89. But we feel especially bound to mention a paper written as long ago as 1875 by the late Louis de Zoyes, for it was called forth by the discussion in the ACADEMY carried on during the latter half of 1874 upon Sir A. Cunningham's discovery of the Buddhist sculptures at Bharhut. The letters of Prof. Max Müller, Prof. Childers, Prof. Samuel Beal, and Mr. James Fergusson are here reprinted.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

GEOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Annual General Meeting, Friday, February 21.)

DR. W. T. BLANFORD, president, in the chair.—The secretaries read the reports of the council and of the library and museum committee for the year 1889. In the former the council had again to congratulate the fellows upon the continued and apparently increasing prosperity of the society, the affairs of which were in a very satisfactory condition. The number of fellows elected during the year was sixty-six, of whom forty-six qualified before the end of the year, together with fifteen previously-elected fellows, and these, with one fellow re-admitted, made a total accession of sixty-two fellows during 1889. Deducting from this, however, thirty-eight for losses by death, resignation, and removal, and for new fellows compounding, the actual increase in the number of contributing fellows amounts to twenty-four. The balance-sheet for the year 1889 showed receipts to the amount of £2775 14s. 3d., and a total expenditure of £2775 2s. 7d., including a sum of £198 5s. 6d. expended in the purchase of stock. The balance in favour of the society on December 31 was £249 4s. 1d.—After the presentation of medals, &c., the president read his anniversary address, in which, after giving obituary notices of several fellows, foreign members, and foreign correspondents deceased since the last annual meeting, he referred briefly to the condition of the society during the past twelve months and to a few works on palaeontological subjects published in the same period. He also mentioned the finding of coal in situ in a boring at Shakspeare's Cliff, and then proceeded with the main subject of his address, namely, "The Permanence of Continents and Ocean-basins." After reviewing the evidence derived from the rocks of oceanic islands, and the absence of deep-sea deposits in continental strata of various ages, he proceeded to the points connected with the geographical distribution of animals and plants, and gave reasons for believing that Solater's zoological regions, founded on passerine birds, were inapplicable to other groups of animals or plants, and that any evidence of continental permanence based on such regions was worthless. He also showed that both elevations and depressions exceeding 1000 fathoms had taken place in tertiary times, and gave an account of the biological and geological facts in support of a former union between several lands now isolated, and especially between Africa and India via Madagascar, and between Africa and South America. From these and other considerations it was concluded that the theory of the permanence of ocean-basins, though probable, was not proved, and was certainly untenable to the extent to which it was accepted by some authors. The following were elected council and officers for the ensuing year: president—Dr. A. Geikie; vice-presidents—Prof. T. G. Bonney, L. Fletcher, W. H. Hudleston, J. W. Hulke; secretaries—Dr. H. Hicks, J. E. Marr; foreign secretary—Sir Warrington W. Smyth; treasurer—Prof. T. Wiltshire; council—Prof. J. F. Blake, Dr. W. T. Blanford, James Carter, Dr. John Evans, Prof. A. H. Green, A. Harker, the Rev. Edwin Hill, W. H. Hudleston, Gen. C. A. McMahon, H. W. Monckton, E. T. Newton, F. W. Rudler, W. Topley, the Rev. G. F. Whidborne, Dr. H. Woodward.

CAMBRIDGE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY.—(Monday, March 5.)

PROF. T. McK. HUGHES, president, in the chair.—The Rev. E. G. Wood gave the following note on the cultus of St. George. Attempts have been made to show that special cultus of St. George of Cappadocia existed in England even in the pre-Norman period; Papenbroch, Selden, Dr. Smith (in his edition of Bede's Martyrology, Cambridge, 1777), and Heylin (in his Life of the Saints) have all done so. It cannot be said that their efforts are very successful, or really go beyond showing that, in common with the rest of Christendom, the Anglo-Saxon Church esteemed St. George highly. One great argument employed has been that in Bede's Martyrology the name of St. George stands alone on April 23; and that this would seem to indicate that in England he was so specially venerated that no other name, as in other Martyrologies, was allowed to appear on that day. This consideration is of little weight, first, because the Martyrologium Vetus Romanum, contemporary with Bede's, itself has St. George's name and none other on April 23, and Rabanus Maurus commemorates only St. George; secondly, Bede's idea, as expressed briefly by himself at the conclusion of the ecclesiastical history, seems to have been to give only the names of martyrs whom he believed to have some genuine history, and the structure of the Martyrology bears this out. Many days are vacant, and many besides April 23 have only one name—e.g., January 18, St. Prisca; and June 15, St. Vitus, other Martyrologies containing many names on those days. Both these are entered exactly as St. George is; but there is no pretence for saying there was any special cultus of either of them in England. An examination of the Leofric Missal does not, except in one MS., disclose anything pointing to a special devotion to St. George. Indeed, in the Calendar his name appears, not among the thirty-four greater feasts of saints marked "F," but among the seventy-seven lesser marked "S." The one exception is the Robert of Jumiege's MS. now at Rouen, which undoubtedly was brought from England in the Conqueror's time. In that the name of St. George, St. Benedict, St. Martha, and St. Gregory are inserted in the Canon of the Mass after St. Lawrence. The most probable origin of the genesis of the patronal cult of St. George in England is, as regards substance, the fact of his general recognition in Europe as patron of soldiers, and, as regards time, the period of the Crusades and the belief in his apparition to Cosme de Lion. The Ordo Romanus, a document dating from the eighth century, is witness to the fact of his being venerated as the spiritual patron of the military art. In the order for the consecration of a knight, the prayer at the girding on of the shield is "by the merits of thy martyrs and soldiers, Maurice, Sebastian, and George, grant to this man victory against his foes." Selden cites an old French ceremonial in which the form of knighthood simply consisted in the words, "Je te fais Chevalier au nom de Dieu et de Monseigneur-Sainte George." Jacobus de Voragine in the Golden Legend quotes John of Antioch as relating the apparition of St. George to the Christian army besieging Jerusalem. The Black Book of Windsor preserves the legend of a similar apparition to Richard I.; and the evidence for the fact of the latter having repaired the ancient Church at Lydda, dedicated to the saint, seems fairly trustworthy. We may therefore without much risk conclude that the Crusaders would bring back with them to England a certain enthusiasm for St. George. It has been alleged that the council of Oxford under Langton in 1222 established the festival of St. George; but there can be little, if any, doubt that the Canon in the Collectio Regia containing a list of festivals is not genuine. No English MS. of the acts of the council contains it, nor is it cited by Lyndwood in the title de Ferris. The feast of St. George does not occur in the Consuetudinary of St. Osmund in its original form, nor is it included in the list contained in Archbishop Islip's Constitutions (1350). But the time was approaching for a formal recognition of the position which popular devotion was gradually according to St. George. The wars alike of the first and the third Edward had much to do with this. Their military glory was identified with the national life. The latter, in establishing the Order of the Garter, had chosen St. George as its patron, and he is related by Thomas of Walsingham to have invoked the saint at Calais when pressed in a certain encounter, "Ha! St. Edward, Ha! St. George." It may be suggested that this invoca-

FINE ART.

TWO FRENCH WORKS ON ROMAN INSCRIPTIONS.

Cours d'Épigraphie latine. Par René Cagnat. (Paris: Thorin.)L'Année épigraphique, 1888. Par René Cagnat. (Paris: Leroux.)

IN 1884-85 M. Cagnat published in that excellent periodical, now unhappily defunct, the Bulletin épigraphique, a series of papers intended to introduce students to the elements of Roman epigraphy; and these papers were afterwards collected into a small volume, under the title of Cours d'Épigraphie élémentaire. But M. Cagnat's critics, the present writer among them, were as unanimous in complaining of the quantity as they were in praising the quality of his work. Accordingly, the author has expanded his book to an octavo of 460 pages, and has dropped the epithet "élémentaire" in the title.

As it now stands, the book consists of: first, a select bibliography, giving the names of the chief works which deal with Roman inscriptions—very few, alas! are English—the cours proper divided into three parts, and, by way of appendix, a full list of abbreviations and sigla, all concluded by an index. The first part of the cours (pp. 1-35) comprises the alphabets used in the inscriptions—monumental, cursive, and so on—with lists of ligatures and ways of expressing numbers. Part II. (pp. 37-217) deals with the elements common to all classes of inscriptions. First, the system of nomenclature is treated; the theory of nomina and praenomina is set forth; and due information is given as to the tribes, the notification of parentage and nationality, and the methods of naming children, slaves, and freedmen. Lists are added showing the abridgments of praenomina and nomina, and of the tribal names. Secondly, the cursum honorum, both senatorial and equestrian, are detailed, with full lists of the honores involved in both careers, and, in addition, of the posts held by officials of inferior rank, librarii regularii, and the like. Thirdly, the names and titles of the emperors and of their relations are detailed, with a chronological catalogue of emperors, showing in each case when the various titles were assumed, and giving the exact date of all the tribunates and consulships. Part III. treats of the various classes of inscriptions separately—sacred, honorary, topographical, sepulchral—laws and documents of various sorts, and the whole mass of inscriptions which fall under the head of instrumentum, lamps, pottery, bricks, tesserae. A complementary chapter gives instances of the restoration of imperfect, and the criticism of suspicious, inscriptions. Lastly, we have the list of abbreviations, extending over nearly seventy pages, and containing about 2500 items.

I have sketched the contents of the book thus at length, because the title does not very clearly indicate them. A Manual of Epigraphy is, in the first place, a new type of book, and the type is as yet unfixed; a would-be purchaser hardly knows what to expect. And further, it is quite worth while pointing out that this particular book contains a mass of facts which will be most useful to others besides epigraphists. Epigraphy deals with every phase of ancient life which is mentioned in inscriptions, and there are few which are not. A Manual of Epigraphy is, therefore, a summary of each of these phases. Most of M. Cagnat's facts are not new. The imperial dates can be evolved from the Corpus, the imperial titles are partly treated in Mommsen's Staatsrecht, the theory of nomenclature in the Römische Forschungen, the equestrian career in Hirschfeld's admirable but (in England) too little known Vorstellungsgeschichte. But M. Cagnat is the only writer known to me who has collected in one volume the salient features of all these questions; and from this point of view I wish most warmly to recommend his book to all English students of Roman history. The chronological table of the emperors is, by itself, of supreme value. It is much to be wished that the book may be translated into English.

As a Manual of Epigraphy, it is necessary to say only that it is a necessary complement to Wilmanns's Exempla. It is superfluous to add that it is a thoroughly scholarly work. Republican France has made vast strides in scientific research; but in no subject has so much good work been done as in Roman epigraphy, and M. Cagnat is the first authority on the subject in France. I trust he will pardon me if I venture to make a few humble criticisms on his excellent book.

And, first, I would suggest that there are three points with respect to which more information would be useful. M. Cagnat says little as to the dating of inscriptions which do not in themselves contain a definite date. He gives us in Part I. a great many details as to the forms of letters, and borrows from Hübner's Specimina a table of ideal alphabets for the first two centuries; but he hardly explains how to use them. It is sadly easy to go wrong in these matters. Of the clues afforded by the appearance of titles like vir egregius or the disappearance of offices like the praefectus castrorum he says (unless I am wrong) nothing at all. More space, again, might be given to military matters. An English reader notices that the seventh volume of the Corpus is seldom quoted; the reason is that the chief British inscriptions are military. A summary of Mommsen's papers in Hermes on recruiting, a list of the legions, with their stations and officers, and some notes on the auxilia, would be most valuable. The list of legions on p. 104 is good in its way, but by no means enough. Thirdly, the gods should be treated with more honour. The deae matres are hardly mentioned, and the reader gets little idea of the varied crowd which adorned the third century pantheon.

A very few criticisms in detail may be added. P. xxii., Mr. Watkin's Roman Cheshire might be mentioned beside his Roman Lancashire. P. xxvi., the Archaeological Journal might perhaps find a place. P. 24, "E for te or et should be mentioned; it is not generally known. P. 64, the abbreviations POMT, POXT, are said by Mommsen to lack authority (Eph. iv., p. 221); the complete Pomontina occurs on a Chester inscription. P. 296, the Boulogne lead pig no doubt "comes from Britain," but the phrase implies that it was found in Britain. The expansion "Legio II." on it seems to me doubtful. Læxx (O.I.L. vii. 1209) is a parallel, and, tion marks a transition. Doubtless the name of St. Edward had been that most frequently in Englishmen's mouths as a national saint. Here he is put before St. George. Under Archbishop Arundel, at a synod held at St. Paul's in 1399, the clergy presented a petition desiring that "the feast of St. George the Martyr, who is the spiritual patron of the soldiery of England, should be appointed to be solemnised throughout England and observed as a holiday, even as other nations observe the feasts of their own patrons" (ex. Reg. Arundel, Wilkins, iii. 241). He is only, it will be observed, spoken of as being as yet recognised as military, not as national patron. The matter, however, dropped through, to be revived under Archbishop Chichele at the beginning of the next reign, that of Henry V. The constitution establishing the feast is in Lyndwood, C. Inaffabilis tit. de Feriis (l. 3). It is ordered that the feast be observed both by clergy and laity as a "greater double" with abstinence from all servile work, even as on the feast of Christmas, and that all should come to church and pray for the saint's patronage and especially "pro Rege et Regni salute," and this was to be observed for all future time. Lyndwood, in his glosses on the constitution, remarks that it was adopted at the express instigation of the king on the eve of his departure for Normandy. He also remarks that, though ceremonially the feast was not put in the highest rank (viz., that of principal greater doubles, which were only Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Ascension, Whitsunday, the Assumption, and the Patronal and Dedication Festivals of a Church), yet that by reason of the abstinence from servile work it was made practically equal. This constitution was then the formal recognition of St. George as the national patron. Devotion to him as such rapidly spread. The Liber Metricus of Thomas of Elmham ascribes the victory of Agincourt to St. George—

O Christi genetrix O miles Sancte Georgi
Sub quibus alma viget Anglia fertilis opem.
cap. 26.

and

Cernitur in Campo sacer ille Georgius armis
Anglorum parte bella parare suis
Protegit hic Anglos victrix manus altitonantis Non nobis sed ei gloria tota datur.
cap. 40.

Thenceforth "St. George for Merry England" was the cry of the nation as well as of her soldiery. It may be noted that the rank assigned to the festival in Chichele's constitution is ignored by the printed copies of the Sarum books. This does not necessarily indicate that the day was not observed as that decree prescribed. We have, in fact, evidence (in the Greyfriars' Chronicle) of its being so observed in London as late as 1552—Canon Chr. Scott added the following observation: In an article contributed to the Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature (Second Series, vol. vii., part i.), Mr. Hogg speaks of a Greek inscription copied from a very ancient church, originally a heathen temple, at Lydda in Syria, dated A.D. 346, in which St. George is spoken of as a holy martyr. This is important testimony, as at this very time was living the other George (Gibbon's "bacon-seller"), the Alexandrian bishop (ob. 362), with whom the saint is sometimes confounded. Selden (Titles of Honour, p. 668), speaking of the Saxon Martyrology in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, says that he doubts St. George's name being first taken under Edward III., because, "in a most ancient Martyrology peculiarly belonging to this kingdom, he is the only saint mentioned for the three and twentieth day of April, though both in the Greek and Latin Martyrology there be divers more beside him on that day. Unless there had been singular honour given him from the nation, why should his name be so honoured with it?" Lingard says that the name of St. George came in the Canon of the Anglo-Saxon Mass.

though not well attested, is, no doubt, correct; but that legion was stationed near the Welsh mines. Where did the second (Isca) legion work? However, I have nothing better to suggest. P. 311, the inscription on the shield (now in York Museum) is on the edge, not "au milieu de figures." I cannot accept the explanation given of the Brough tesserae on the same page. It has, indeed, Hübner's approval; but it is difficult to believe that all soldiers had such leaden seals put on their necks on enrolment, and yet that such seals have turned up only in England, and there very oddly distributed. Felixstowe, Chesters, South Shields and High Rochester have each contributed a few; several thousand (it is said) have been found at Brough-under-Stainmoor, most of which will have to be hunted out by the editors of the projected supplement to the Lapidarium Septentrionale. I would rather connect these tiny objects with the expedition of Severus into the North. One seal is certainly of the date required (Eph. iii., p. 318); and, though one is supposed to belong to the age of Constantine, the fact seems not to be by any means certain. South Shields itself, to judge by the dates assigned to its inscriptions, owed much of its Roman importance to the age of Severus. Moreover, leaving out the port of Felixstowe, all the seals have occurred on or near lines of march northward; and it is possible that we have really to deal with some form of luggage-label. The rather different leaden seal of Constantine found at Richborough probably served some similar purpose. In any case, M. Schuerman's theory that the things were projectiles de guerre is certainly wrong.

It remains only to commend L'Année épigraphique, 1888 to epigraphists. M. Cagnat has undertaken the laudable design of contributing to the Revue Archéologique periodical summaries of newly published inscriptions. Those who cannot (and few can) consult all epigraphical journals may hence learn the most important novelties. L'Année épigraphique, 1888 is a reprint of the summaries for 1888. Two inscriptions have an interest for English readers: that on the lead pig alluded to above; and No. 121 from Worms, a dedication by one Amandus Velugni fil Devas, where M. Cagnat, following Zangemeister, supposes Devas to mean "a native of Deva," that is, of Chester. This is the first time the name of the city has appeared in an inscription.

F. HAVERFIELD.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. ORCHARDSON, we are glad to hear, has made great progress with that portrait of himself which is destined to be lodged in the Uffizi, at Florence, among the historic collection of portraits of famous artists.

AN important landscape, representing a well-known view in Berkshire, near the Thames, will, we hear, be Mr. Goodall's chief contribution to the Royal Academy this season.

MR. WALTER SICKERT has begun a portrait of Mr. George Moore, the novelist. It is not possible, however, that this can be finished in time for the forthcoming exhibition of the New English Art Club. To that exhibition Mr. Sickert will send a portrait of Mr. Bradlaugh, busy at his desk, and a portrait of a tall slim young lady—Miss Fancourt—in a black dinner-dress. The lady is seen chiefly from behind; but the turned head displays the profile. The treatment of a model refined in line and colour is itself exceedingly refined. And it may interest our readers to know that, though the picture does not suggest to the beholder any association with the music-halls, which Mr. Sickert has before now been wont to celebrate, it is, in fact, a goddess of the music-halls who is portrayed in evening attire. Miss Fancourt, we believe, is known to a large section of the public as "Queenie Lawrence," and Queenie Lawrence is an eminent "serio-comic."

THE exhibitions to open next week include that of the Society of Lady Artists (professional), in the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly; and the Stanley and African Exhibition, in the Victoria Gallery, Regent Street.

IN pursuance of their object of rendering the annual exhibition as instructive as possible, the council of the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers have decided to hold a conversazione in the gallery on Saturday evening, March 22. The chief feature of interest on the occasion will be an address given by the president, Mr. Seymour Haden.

MR. W. J. LINTON will read a paper before the Society of Arts, on Tuesday next, upon "Engraving in Wood, Old and New."

WE quote the following from the Oxford Magazine;

"The British School at Athens will begin exploration almost immediately at Megalopolis. They have not succeeded in getting Troezen, as they had hoped, the local proprietors having proved too hard for either English or French diplomacy. What may be found at Megalopolis it is impossible to prophesy. The site is enormous, and contains vestiges of every kind. The large theatre will probably be cleared, and may yield some statuary—a class of treasures for which theatres have seldom been searched in vain; but it is unnecessary to say that such a site cannot yield anything of very early date. Mr. Ernest Gardner will superintend the excavations; and Mr. G. O. Richards, of Hertford College, will also take part in them."

AT a meeting of the Society for the Preservation of the Monuments of Ancient Egypt, held on Friday, March 14, with the Earl of Wharncliffe, president, in the chair, the following resolution—proposed by Mr. Henry Wallis, with an amendment by General Brackenbury—was passed:—

"That this meeting has heard with feelings of profound grief and dismay the account of the recent wanton mutilation of the ancient monuments at Beni Hassan, Tel-el-Amarna, and El-Bersheh, in Upper Egypt—a disaster, as Prof. Sayce truly observes, exceeding all that has befallen the remains of Egyptian art during the past half-century; and that this meeting earnestly hopes that the Egyptian Government will take steps for the appointment of an efficient staff for the custody and inspection of important monuments, to prevent acts of this nature being again committed."

THE firm of William George's Sons—to whom Bristol is so much indebted for maintaining her literary fame—have now conferred an obligation upon all Wordsworthians by publishing a reproduction of an early portrait of the poet, formerly in the possession of Joseph Cottle, and numbered 1 in Prof. Knight's Portraits of Wordsworth. Of its genuineness there seems no doubt. It is signed "W. Shuter, 1798," and was, of course, painted in the Nether Stowey days. The reproduction, in photogravure, has been done by Herr Haefstangl, of Munich, in the exact dimensions of the original. It is the lyric compeer of Coleridge, not the sage of Grasmere, that appears in this youthful face, with its bright eyes and soft mouth. The high nose alone recalls the more familiar portraits of old age.

THE STAGE.

OBITUARY.

BY the death of Mr. John Maclean—which occurred at his lodgings in Percy Street, this day week—we lose one who was personally a popular and most estimable member of the theatrical profession, and an actor who was among the very safest to whom responsible parts could be entrusted. Mr. Maclean was probably never actually brilliant, and we imagine that he had of late been losing force. But that he was thoroughly intelligent and sympathetic—thoroughly hardworking and not unsuccessful—need hardly be told. Though Mr. Maclean, when he was taken from us, was at least as near fifty or sixty, it is, we are reminded, nearly thirty years ago that he first assumed upon the London stage the character of the respectable, kind-hearted, middle-aged, or even elderly man, with which, ever since, he has been wont to be associated. He played, it seems, the part of Mr. Gibson, the employer of Bob Brierly, in "The Ticket of Leave Man," when that most popular of all the pieces by Tom Taylor was first produced at the Olympic Theatre. At that time, Mr. Maclean's own age can scarcely have exceeded six and twenty; but though cheeriness of temperament would doubtless have prevented this admirable player from ever getting old in spirit, it may be that he was one of those who seem never actually young in physique. John Maclean was a steady supporter of Mr. John Hollingshead during a considerable period of that gentleman's management of the Gaiety—not, however in the later days, when the sacred lamp of burlesque had become the first thing and the last. Mr. Maclean's last appearance, we believe, was as Sir Peter Teazle—a character which, in his hands, lacked at once the necessary fire and the necessary stateliness or ceremony, but which, nevertheless, he interpreted with intelligence and sympathy. The stage possesses but few actors on whom a manager may rely so easily and safely as it was always possible to do upon Mr. Maclean.

STAGE NOTES.

AN affection of the eyes has, we are sorry to say, compelled Mr. David James to retire from the Criterion Theatre for the present. "Our Boys"—which would be little without him—has accordingly been withdrawn; and the re-appearance of Mr. Charles Wyndham, who has just returned from America, is fixed for to-night.

MISS EVA MOORE was for several nights last week—during the illness of the original interpreter—playing Miss Annie Hughes's part in "The Middleman" with great success.

A VERSION of "The Relapse," by Mr. Robert Buchanan, was to be produced at the Vaudeville on Thursday afternoon.

IT is said that Mr. Sydney Grundy's play, "Esther Sandrez"—which was brought out at a matinée by Miss Amy Roselle, but which Mrs. Langtry immediately purchased—will be the next venture at the St. James's Theatre; and it is further stated that, though "As You Like It" has been fairly successful, its run is not likely to be prolonged much beyond Easter.

WHEN the present Adelphi melodrama shall have finished its course, a revival of "The Green Bushes" is contemplated. This will be of interest, as the piece was deemed desperately exciting by the fathers of those who sit in the Adelphi pit to-night. Meanwhile, Mr. George Alexander and Miss Alma Murray have, for a while at least, left the theatre—Mr. Alexander to assume the part which Mr. Fred. Terry has given up in "Dr. Bill" at the Avenue, and Miss Alma Murray, we regret to hear, through an indisposition occasioned by a cab accident.

MISS MAUD MILLETT—a portrait of whom, by Mr. Bartlett, is likely to be seen at the Royal Academy—will have no part in the forthcoming piece, by Mr. Arthur Law, at the Shaftesbury; but Mr. Willard will be supported by Miss Olga Brandon, Mr. Joan Watson, Mr. Alfred Bishop, and others. The scene of the new piece is laid in the moors of Devonshire, and Mr. Willard—once more forsaking the respectable—will appear in the guise of an escaped convict.

MR. HENRY NEVILLE is before long to leave for America.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE first concert of the Philharmonic Society took place at St. James's Hall last Thursday week. Weber's interesting Overture—"Ruler of the Spirits"—opened the programme. Next came an Orchestral Suite, a collection of dance movements from Grétry's opera "Céphale et Procris," produced at Paris in 1773. Mr. F. H. Cowen is responsible for this mode of presentation. Of the music itself there is little to say. It is pretty and pleasing, but lacks contrast. We cannot see that there is any particular gain to art in a revival of this kind. A Fantaisie for piano and orchestra, by M. Widor, was given for the first time, under the direction of the composer. Two seasons ago his Symphonic Poem—"Walpurgis Night"—was heard at one of this society's concerts, and produced very little effect. The new work is less noisy; but beyond a certain amount of skill in the workmanship and orchestration, we fail to recognise any merit in it. It lacks originality, and is at times commonplace. We must, however, mention that it was much applauded. M. Philipp played the pianoforte part well, but it is impossible to judge of his powers from this performance. M. Blauwaert, the well-known Belgian artist, sang an air from Bach's Cantata—"The Strife between Phoebus and Pan"—and Wotan's Abschied from "Die Walküre." He was more successful in the latter, which was given with much declamatory power. The programme also included Dr. Mackenzie's characteristic Overture—"Twelfth Night"—under his own direction, and the "Scotch" Symphony. Mr. F. H. Cowen conducted everything except the two works specially mentioned. The Philharmonic orchestra still maintains its supremacy in the string department.

On Saturday afternoon Mme. Backer Gröndahl appeared at the Popular Concert, and played a group of short solos. Her reading of Schumann's Novelette in F (op. 21, no. 1) was not altogether to our taste. The plaintive melody of the Trio lacked repose. Chopin's Prelude in D flat was too slow, and Mendelssohn's Study in B flat minor might have been taken faster. In tone and technique, however, Mme. Gröndahl was all that could be desired. She was well received, and repeated the Study. Mme. Néruda gave with much charm Vitali's Chaconne in G minor. Mrs. Henschel sang in a most delightful manner an air from Handel's "Hercules" and Grieg's "Solveig's Song." The programme further comprised Schumann's Quartet in A minor (op. 41, no. 1), and Grieg's Sonatina C minor for piano and violin. The latter work was interpreted by Mmes. Néruda and Gröndahl with skill, sympathy, and refinement.

On the following Monday evening, Sgambati's pianoforte Quintet in B flat (op. 5) was given. The composer, who has English blood in his veins, was for many years a pupil of Liszt. In 1882 he visited London, conducting his first Symphony at the Crystal Palace and playing his pianoforte Concerto at a Philharmonic concert. The Quintet is a remarkably clever work, and indeed appeals chiefly to the intellect. Mr. Dannreuther introduced it at one of his chamber concerts some seasons back. Mme. Gröndahl played the pianoforte part on Monday, and was afterwards heard to advantage in Chopin's Fantasia in F minor. Miss Liza Lehmann, who was the vocalist, sang a pretty and fanciful song, "Go, rose," by Maurice Greene, the contemporary of Handel. The programme included Schubert's Quintet in C (op. 163), one of his greatest works.

Miss Florence May gave a concert at Prince's Hall on Wednesday evening. In Brahms' Variations on a Paganini theme (op. 35, second set) she proved herself an accomplished pianist. This exceedingly difficult piece was performed in admirable style. The technique was neat and the phrasing clear. Miss May afterwards played some short waltzes of her own composition, well written and pleasing, especially the first two. She took part in Mendelssohn's C minor Trio and Brahms' Sonata in G for piano and violin. She gave a conscientious reading of both works, but her tone in the quiet passages was somewhat dry. She was assisted by Herr Gompertz and Mr. Howell. The latter, our best English 'cellist, played as solo a Marcello Sonata with great effect.

We regret that we cannot notice Saturday's Crystal Palace concert, at which Dr. Joachim and M. E. Gillet played Brahms' double Concerto for violin, 'cello, and orchestra; nor the performance of Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" by the Hackney choir under the direction of Mr. Prout at Shoreditch Town Hall on Monday evening.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE Richter Series of nine concerts will commence on Monday, May 12. Works by standard composers will be given, and special prominence will be accorded to Wagner. In the present scheme Dr. Richter has enriched the list by eight important excerpts from that composer's operas and music dramas—viz., Scene 2, Act i., from "Tannhäuser; Scene 4, Act ii., from "Walküre"; Scene and Duet, Act iii., from "Siegfried"; also selections from "Götterdämmerung" and "Meistersinger, and the Overture to "Die Feen." One programme in the course of the season will be devoted exclusively to Wagner, and another to Beethoven.

Musical Notes, 1889. By Hermann Klein. (Novello.) This annual critical record of important musical events is drawn up with the author's usual care; and, although only a "brief or abstract chronicle," the facts are presented in an attractive and thoroughly readable manner. Hitherto Mr. Klein had confined himself to the musical doings of the metropolis, but this year he has added a series of articles, signed by writers of recognised ability, embodying in succinct form the leading musical events in the provinces and in Scotland. Mr. S. S. Stratton represents Birmingham; Mr. E. J. Shellard, Bristol; Mr. Peterson, Edinburgh; Mr. W. I. Argent, Liverpool; Dr. Hiles, Manchester; the Rev. J. H. Mee, Oxford; and Mr. J. Tatham, Yorkshire; besides, Cambridge is signed X and Glasgow F. These articles will, of course, greatly increase the value of this year-book as a work of reference.

NEW NOVELS.

THE DUKE'S DAUGHTER
AND THE FUGITIVES. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.
3 vols., crown 8vo, 25s. 6d.

CLAIRE BRANDON.
By FREDERICK MARSHALL, Author of
"French Home Life." 3 vols., crown 8vo, 25s. 6d.

THE BULL I' TH' THORN.
By PAUL OUSHING, Author of "The Blacksmith of Voe." 3 vols., crown 8vo, 25s. 6d.

"A genuine romance, fresh, vigorous, stirring, that acts on us like a breath from the broad sea....The author has power, yet delicacy of touch; a bright, racy, firm, straight-forward style, and that art which can make characters live, move, and have their being." Saturday Review.

"As a story of exciting military adventure, 'The Bull i' th' Thorn' is not likely to be soon surpassed." Spectator.

"The whole story is racy, unconventional, and exciting to a degree, as well as being admirably written and full of striking passages and incidents." Pump Court.

It is an excellent story, and will add much to its author's reputation."—Scotsman.

DR. HERMIONE. By the Author of "Lady Bluebeard," "Zit and Xoe." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Clever little story, with a character of its own.... Few people figure in it, but those few are well and crisply drawn."—Athenaeum.

"The still anonymous author who followed up 'Zit and Xoe' by 'Lady Bluebeard,' possesses the gift rare among novelists, of writing sparkling dialogue.... Nothing is so good as his description of the Lake district in autumn, unless it be his pictures of the surroundings of the Nile."—Punch.

"The author handles a simple story of modern life with charming freshness and exceptional skill. 'Dr. Hermione' is one of those perfectly natural tales which the quiet reader will linger over with growing pleasure and increasing interest."—Daily Chronicle.

"A delightful new novel.... It is full of fresh fun and smiling humour."—Scotsman.

"There are some bright descriptions of out-of-the-way phases of London life.... It makes a very readable novel."—Literary World.

DODO AND I. By Captain
ANDREW HAGGARD, D.S.O. Second Edition.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

"This book is not unlikely to take the services by storm, whilst its admirers will not be confined to them alone.... All lovers of a really good novel, extravagances notwithstanding, should most assuredly secure this one."—Admiralty and Home-Guards' Gazette.

"Captain Andrew Haggard's 'Dodo and I' is a book that everybody will read.... It is fresh, interesting, and amusing."—Scots Observer.

"The story is distinctly good."—Athenaeum.

"'Dodo and I' is very amusing reading, and certainly should not be overlooked by anyone who studies modern fiction."—John Bull.

"Strange, weird and attractive romance.... Interesting and graphically written."—Morning Advertiser.

"'Dodo and I' is a rattling story."—Morning Post.

MASTER OF HIS FATE.

By J. MACLAREN COBBAN, Author of "The Cure of Souls," "Tinted Vapours," &c. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d.

"A distinctly clever piece of work."—Athenaeum.

"An enthralling tale, the great charm of which is that it is laid among ordinary scenes and enacted by ordinary characters."—World.

"A strange story, invested with an intensity of interest which, even had it been much longer than it is, would carry the reader through it at a single sitting." Scotsman.

"It is indeed a powerful piece of work, simply but effectively constructed, and containing situations of extreme originality.... The author has worked out a new and striking idea with skill and power." Pictorial World.

"An exceedingly striking, powerful, and—if we may use a word which has been too cruelly hackneyed of late—weird tale."—Daily News.

"A story quite out of the common, admirably written."—Vanity Fair.

REMINGTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

SIN of JOOST AVELINGH: a Dutch Story. By MAARTEN MAARTENS. 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s.

Some Press Notices.

The Academy says: "A book by a man of genuine genius. A true artist. A book of singular freshness and power." The Athenaeum says: "Unquestionably a good piece of work, with clear delineation, accurate picture of life, and abundance of local colour." The Standard says: "In scarcely any of the sensational novels of the day will the reader find more nature or more human nature."

THE BLACK BOX MURDER: a Story. By the MAN WHO DISCOVERED the MURDERER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Athenaeum says: "May be recommended to those who like detective stories as a good specimen of the class." The Liverpool Courier says: "Most ingeniously wrought; equal in interest and novelty to the most popular sensational stories."

The right of translation of this story has been bought a few weeks after publication for Engelhorn's well-known "Library of Fiction" in Germany.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

MR. MONTAGU WILLIAMS'S REMINISCENCES.

LEAVES of a LIFE: being the Reminiscences of Montague Williams, Q.C.

2 vols., 8vo, 80s.

The Standard says:—"The book is full of matter that will interest the public."The Daily Telegraph says:—"These thoroughly entertaining volumes."Murray's Magazine says:—"A bright gathering of reminiscences of an exceptionally busy and interesting career."The Guardian says:—"The first duty of a dealer in reminiscences is to tell good stories, and Mr. Montagu Williams has fulfilled this duty."The Church Review says:—"It is no mere figure of speech to say there is not a dull page in these volumes. It is literally true, and their value for purposes of reference is much enhanced by a capital index."

A NEW BOOK BY SIR CHARLES DILKE, BART.

PROBLEMS of GREATER BRITAIN. By the Right Hon. Sir Charles Dilke, Bart.

With Maps. 2 vols., 8vo, 36s.

The Tablet says:—"The most interesting book of the year, and the work which is likely to have at once the widest and the best influence upon the political thought of our time, is Sir Charles Dilke's 'Problems of Greater Britain.' It has met a great want, and met it well, and it stands alone."The Graphic says:—"It is difficult to over-estimate the importance of Sir Charles Dilke's 'Problems of Greater Britain.' It is one of the most important books published for many years, and is worthy to rank beside such a monumental work as that of Professor Bryce on the United States. In these two elaborate volumes we have the latest views of one of the foremost statesmen of this generation: a man who almost from boyhood has diligently trained himself for high office in the State, and who has studied, with more assiduity and enthusiasm than probably any other living man, the vast and complicated problems connected with the immense organisation known as the British Empire. Knowledge, candour, and statesmanship are the conspicuous qualities of the book, and its style is clear and sometimes stately. A noteworthy book which will have wide and permanent influence."

SECOND AND CHEAPER EDITION, REVISED.

THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH. By James Bryce, M.P., D.C.L., Regius

Professor of Civil Law in the University of Oxford; Author of "The Holy Roman Empire." Second Edition. 2 vols., extra crown 8vo, 36s.

Part I. THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT.

Part II. THE STATE GOVERNMENTS.

Part III. THE PARTY SYSTEM.

Part IV. PUBLIC OPINION.

Part V. ILLUSTRATIONS AND REFLECTIONS.

Part VI. SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS.

The Nation (New York) says:—"The book does not disappoint these expectations. Every page gives evidence of the conscientious labour which the author has given to his work. As we read his pages, their suggestive and instructive value to America is so great and so patent that we find ourselves concluding the book is written for us. No earnest and intelligent American can afford to remain ignorant of it. His education will be incomplete as a preparation for his duties as a citizen if he does not take advantage of the helps to a sound judgment and noble purpose which are here given."

THE DEVELOPMENT and CHARACTER of GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE. By Professor CHARLES HERBERT MOORE. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 18s.

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"This is a very interesting and ingenious book. It is sure to attract attention everywhere. The ordinary reader will find in it an agreeable and instructive handbook, and the numerous woodcuts are well adapted to their illustrative purpose."

AMONG the SELKIRK GLACIERS: being the Account of a Rough Survey in the Rocky Mountain Regions of British Columbia. By WILLIAM SPOTSWOOD GREEN, M.A., F.R.G.S., Author of "The High Alps of New Zealand." Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"For the pedestrian, horseman, and bicyclist, a handy pocket guide to almost indispensable. Mr. Stanford has estimated the situation correctly, and, as far as we can judge, has made most creditable provision. Nothing can be more convenient than the volumes of this little two-shilling county series; the type, though closely printed, is clear, and they are nearly as light and twice as portable as a fairly filled cigar case."

"The story is by turns pathetic, dramatic, humorous, and full of interesting character and bright dialogue from first to last. In addition to Mrs. Maron, the authors give us some smart character sketches in Henri de Tules, Captain Ma'lore, the daughter Alice, and the son Harold. As a story it is bright, smart, effective, and never for a moment dull."

FOR SOMEBODY'S SAKE.

3 vols.

By EDITH STEWART DREWRY,

Author of "Only an Actress," "On Dangerous Ground," &c.

"For Somebody's Sake" is a book that will obtain from the large class of novel-readers a wide and well-deserved popularity. The story is interesting and carried out with considerable artistic skill; opening brightly it so continues to the end. The characters are lifelike. There are throughout the book some very lively descriptions and excellent dialogue illustrating various phases of society and high life. The conversations are pointed and well sustained.—Lit.

The Seat of Authority in Religion.

By JAMES MARTINEAU, LL.D., D.D., D.C.L.

1 vol., 8vo, 14s.

This work is the Author's attempt to make clear to himself the ultimate ground of pure religion in the human mind, and the permanent essence of the religion of Christ in history. It is addressed to the requirements, not of specialists, philosophers, and scholars, but of educated persons interested in the results of modern knowledge.

A DICTIONARY of APPLIED

CHEMISTRY. By T. E. THORPE, B.Sc. (Vict.), Ph.D., F.R.S., Treas. C.S., Professor of Chemistry in the Normal School of Science and Royal School of Mines, South Kensington. Assisted by Eminent Contributors.

"It is probable that this volume will have even a larger sale than that of the corresponding 'Dictionary of Pure Chemistry,' and, as with that important work, so with this, the public may well be congratulated on possessing such a valuable book of reference so creditable to all concerned in its production. An examination of the important articles written by specially qualified contributors indicates that each subject is brought up to the level of the present state of our knowledge. It is a welcome addition to our scientific books of reference, and forms an admirable companion to 'Wat's Dictionary of Theoretical Chemistry.'" Sir H. E. Roscoe, in Nature.

EDNA LYALL'S NOVELS.

Each in One Volume, Crown 8vo, 6s.

A HARDY NORSEMAN.

"All the quiet humour we praised in 'Donovan' is to be found in the new story. And the humour, though never demonstrative, has a charm of its own. It is no Edna Lyall's plan to give her readers much elaborate description, but when she does describe scenery her picture is always alive with vividness and grace."—Athenæum

DONOVAN: a Modern Englishman.

"This is a very admirable work. The reader is from the first carried away by the gallant unconventionality of its author. 'Donovan' is a very excellent novel; but it is something more and better. It should do as much good as the best sermon ever written or delivered extempore. The story is told with a grand simplicity, an unconscious poetry of eloquence, which stirs the very depths of the heart. One of the main excellences of this novel is the delicacy of touch with which the author shows her most delightful characters to be after all human beings, and not angels before their time."—Standard.

WE TWO.

"A work of deep thought and much power. Serious as it is, it is now and then brightened by rays of genuine humour. Altogether this story is more and better than a novel."—Morning Post.
 "There is artistic realism both in the conception and the delineation of the personages; the action and interest are unflinchingly sustained from first to last, and the book is pervaded by an atmosphere of elevated, earnest thought."—Scotsman.

IN THE GOLDEN DAYS.

"Miss Lyall has given us a vigorous study of such life and character as are really worth reading about. The central figure of her story is Algernon Sydney; and this figure she invests with a singular dignity and power. He always appears with effect, but no liberties are taken with the facts of his life. The plot is adapted with great felicity to them. His part in it, absolutely consistent as it is with historical truth, gives it reality as well as dignity. Some of the scenes are remarkably vivid. The escape is an admirable narrative, which almost makes one hold one's breath as one reads."—Spectator.

KNIGHT-ERRANT.

"'Knight-Errant' is marked by the author's best qualities as a writer of fiction, and displays on every page the grace and quiet power of her former works."—Athenæum.
 "This plot, and, indeed, the whole story, is gracefully fresh and very charming: there is a wide humanity in the book that cannot fail to accomplish its author's purpose."—Literary World.
 "This novel is distinctly helpful and inspiring from its high tone, its intense human feeling, and its elevated morality. It forms an additional proof, if such were needed, that Miss Lyall has a mandate to write."—Academy.

WON BY WAITING.

"The Dean's daughters are perfectly real characters—the learned Cornelia especially; the little impulsive French heroine, who endures their cold hospitality, and at last wins their affection, is thoroughly charming; while throughout the book there runs a golden thread of pure brotherly and sisterly love, which pleasantly reminds us that the making and marring of marriage is not, after all, the sum total of real life."—Academy.

Each Work complete in 1 vol. price 5s., illustrated by Sir J. E. MILLAIS, Sir JOHN GILBERT, HOLMAN HUNT, JOHN LEECH, BIRKET FOSTER, LASLETT POTT, JOHN TENNIEL, E. J. POYNTER, F. SANDYS, &c.

LITERATURE.

A History of Modern Europe. By C. A. Fyffe. Vol. III. (Cassell.)

THE third part of Mr. Fyffe's History is of the same character as the preceding volumes. The narrative, if commonplace, is well ordered; events are placed in reasonably fair proportion, though military events are weakly described; and the views taken are comprehensive and broad. The judgments pronounced on leading men are, however, partial in some instances; the work is pervaded by a kind of sentiment disagreeable to enquirers after simple truth; and facts of importance are, more than once, slurred over if they do not fall in with the author's theories.

This volume comprises the momentous period between 1848 and 1878. Mr. Fyffe, we think, is correct in stating that the principle of nationality has been, so to speak, the determining force in European affairs throughout this era of unrest and trouble. Other forces, indeed, religious and social, have made themselves felt with marked effect; but the efforts of races, previously kept apart by barriers and distinctions of all kinds, to come together, and to assert their unity, have been the main feature of this passage of history. Italy, "the geographical phrase" of Metternich, is one state within its natural limits; Prussia is supreme over forty millions of Germans; Hungary is independent under the dual monarchy, though no one will try to predict its future; the Christian people of the East have, in a great measure, shaken off the yoke of their Turkish conquerors. The general revolution of 1848 was the first act of this mighty drama; and it is a disagreeable subject for those who have faith, like Mr. Fyffe, in mere popular movements. Mr. Fyffe describes the facts in sufficient detail, and he is too candid to suppress the truth; but he does not bring out in proper relief the two characteristics of this period, and his general conclusions are largely misleading. Nearly the whole continent outside France, the Ottoman Empire, and half-foreign Russia, asserted the claim of divided races to form themselves into national groups—a German parliament met at Frankfurt; Hungarian home rule was proclaimed by Kossuth; and Italy rose in arms from the Alps to the Straits. But the impulse was given by mobs and theorists; it was not controlled by one real statesman; it was marked by violence, ignorance, and intense selfishness; and it ended in almost complete failure. Bad as the system of Metternich was in the Austrian Empire, from the Theiss to the Danube, and especially in down-trodden Italy, and miserable as was the absolutism of the German states—the shame and degradation of the Teutonic race—still the attempts to subvert this state of things led to disaster and humiliating defeat; and this was mainly due to the short-sighted folly, the vehemence, and the greed of democratic passion. The extraordinary force which the kingly principle retained, in spite of every adverse influence, is the other cardinal fact of the time—the monarchy in Austria was unscathed, nay strengthened; in Prussia the monarchy was never shaken; the Sardinian monarchy was the only real force developed in the great rising of Italy. As regards France, her nationality already existed; but the revolution made itself apparent in mad Socialism and Communistic foolishness, and in a revival of the Jacobinism of 1793. It would be too much to say that the power of kingship had anything to do with the sudden formation of the French empire in 1852. This was partly the result of a strong reaction against anarchy and the licence of the mob, and partly of the magic of Napoleon's name; but Caesarism is the monarchy of a revolutionary state, and the rise of Louis Napoleon was a marked sign of the time.

One of the effects of the revolution of 1848-49 was to make Russia the dominant power of the continent. She had lent an army to Austria in the war with Hungary; she had dictated in arrogant terms to Prussia; she had on her side the Conservative forces, always powerful after an age of anarchy. She cast her eye accordingly on the Turkish empire; and there can be little doubt that Nicholas thought he could dismember it with the assent of Europe, and gorge on the coveted prey of Catherine. This was the real origin of the Crimean war, not, as Mr. Fyffe hints, the meddling of Louis Napoleon; and the struggle, we maintain, was for a righteous cause—to check the preponderance of a half-barbarous power, even though it involved a Turkish alliance. We entirely deny, what Mr. Fyffe asserts, that the Crimean war was a mere waste of blood as regards the interests of Western Europe. It brought Russia down from a bad eminence, and crippled her for ten years at least; and, though the regeneration of the Turk has proved a dream, the experiment was well worth a trial. Mr. Fyffe's account of the contest is poor and meagre. He does not notice the genius displayed by Todleben in the defence of Sebastopol; he sneers at Louis Napoleon to praise Pelissier, an ignorant soldier of the Algerian type. And, though the military organisation of England, as has usually happened, at first broke down, we demur to his statement that the martial renown of the British Army in any sense suffered. Unquestionably Sardinia was the power which gained most by the Crimean War. Cavour perceived that a league with England and France would gain for his country a great position; and he seized the occasion with characteristic genius. Mr. Fyffe's sketch of the life and the career of this most remarkable and accomplished statesman is one of the best and truest parts of his book. The far-sighted, cautious, and masterly policy—a grand adaptation of means to ends—of the real creator of modern Italy, stands in marked contrast with the wild recklessness and the discordant aims of the patriots of 1848. Cavour was sustained by the great principle of nationality in what he did for Italy; but he translated the idea into a magnificent fact, which was realised mainly through his efforts. And the capacity, the statecraft, the keen dexterity, he displayed in dealing with Louis Napoleon, with Garibaldi, and with his own countrymen, place him in the foremost rank of the great men of this century. Not democratic passion, or popular risings, not even the victories of 1859, but statesmanship worthy of the best days of Rome, has achieved the independence of a united Italy.

The unity of Italy was a precursor, and, Mr. Fyffe thinks, a principal cause of the unity of Germany, as it exists at present. In both instances the result was due to the spirit of nationality as the essential force; but in both the principle bore no fruits until it had passed out of the hands of demagogues and multitudes into the hands of statesmen. Bismarck probably is the master spirit of the great men who have made Germany, to a considerable extent, an undivided nation; but he had eminent fellow workers in the same sphere; and the military ascendancy secured to Prussia, which immediately led to German unity, was mainly due to King William, Roon, and Moltke. Mr. Fyffe evidently considers Bismarck at least equal to Cavour in genius. In this judgment we do not concur; Cavour has certainly surpassed Mazarin; but Bismarck holds a lower place than Richelieu, though in his audacity, his firmness, and the force of his character, he strongly resembles the great cardinal. It is at least doubtful whether, as Mr. Fyffe assumes, Bismarck had thought out, when comparatively young, the policy of making Prussia the head of Germany, and driving Austria out of the federal league; but he resented the supremacy possessed by the Kaiser, and probably he resolved to try "blood and iron" when he had become aware of the power of the Prussian army. He befuddled Austria in the Danish war, and showed much statecraft in all that followed; but the chances were against him when he challenged Austria to a mortal struggle in 1866. His conduct irritated two-thirds of Germany; and Cavour would have shown more resource and prudence. We pass over the campaign of Sadowa, imperfectly described by Mr. Fyffe, and by almost every writer we know. The victory of Prussia was quite decisive, and Bismarck attained every end he sought, though in this he was more indebted to fortune than any eminent man of the present age. After the expulsion of Austria from the league of Germany the German policy of Bismarck was able in the extreme. He took care not to humiliate his late enemy; he let the force of nationality have free play; and he consolidated the northern and southern states before the outbreak of the great war of 1870-1. History, however, will have to pronounce hereafter whether his policy towards France was wise or prudent. He seems not to have courted war, but he certainly exasperated France as a nation; and, when it came, he seized the occasion, we think, to force a quarrel on France when unprepared for the conflict. Mr. Fyffe's description of the war of 1870-1 is insufficient, but reasonably just. He shows how immense was the military inferiority of France; but, strangely enough, he sneers at Louis Napoleon, who, many as were his faults and shortcomings, was almost the only Frenchman convinced of this truth. He deals impartially with Moltke, Macmahon, and Bazaine; he clearly brings out Gambetta's powers; but he does not make nearly enough of Chanzy, a warrior of remarkable gifts. The Peace of Frankfort has made another struggle between Germany and France a mere affair of time. The statesmanship of Bismarck was hardly wise if he insisted on the dismemberment of the most warlike and intensely national state in Europe; but it is understood that the cession of Alsace and Lorraine was the demand of the king and the Prussian staff.

Mr. Fyffe believes in the recent statement that the establishment of the German empire was a suggestion of the Crown Prince of Prussia, the late justly regretted Emperor Frederick. That structure may have deep-rooted foundations. It is not the mere creation of force and conquest; it has still the support of the German race; it reflects the splendour of the marvels of war. But it is exposed to the deadly enmity of France; and those who understand the discords of faith in Germany will doubt if it is as solid a work as the Italian kingdom. Bismarck evidently is aware of the facts; and his foreign policy has ever since been to keep France under a feeble government, and to unite Austria, Germany, and Russia in a close alliance. His policy as yet has proved successful, but it is questionable if its success will endure; and signs are not wanting that France and Russia may form a league in their supposed interests, which would plunge the Continent in a tremendous conflict, and perhaps efface the settlement made at Frankfort. Mr. Fyffe does not refer to the long quarrel between Bismarck and the Papal power, yet it is significant and of profound interest. The result indicates that "blood and iron," however triumphant, may not be wisdom; and that in this, as in other instances, the world is not ruled by the material force on which Bismarck, unlike Cavour, relies evidently, in the main, to accomplish his ends. The rising of the Slavic races in Eastern Europe, and their tendency to form national groups, has been the last exhibition of the peculiar spirit which is the characteristic of the present age; and this led to the war of 1877-8, the latest sharp crisis of the Eastern Question. Mr. Fyffe has given us a sketch of that war sufficiently full for the general reader, but his reflections on the results are of dubious value. The doom of the Ottoman Empire may be at hand; but whether Serbia, Bulgaria, and states of that kind will form a real bulwark against Russian power, it is not possible to predict with confidence. Should the Czar proclaim Pan Slavism as a faith, the Eastern Question may involve a struggle which might change the boundaries of the greater part of the Continent.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

A Thousand Miles on an Elephant in the Shan States. By Holt S. Hallett. (Blackwood.)

FOR over a decade Mr. Hallett's name has been prominently associated with the work of exploration in Indo-China, and more particularly with the expeditions undertaken in connexion with the extension of the Burmese Railway system to Siam and South-west China. While still in the employment of the Indian Government as civil engineer attached to the Tenasserim Division, he had an opportunity of examining the ground about the divide between the Lower Salwin and Menam basins. This was before the year 1879, when he retired from the British service; and since then he appears to have been almost continuously occupied with the preliminary work that has to be done before those railway projects can take practical shape. He has worked either single-handed or jointly with Mr. Colquhoun and others, mostly, it appears, without any remuneration, and—needless to add—without any official recognition, in laying the foundations of an undertaking which may be regarded as not merely useful, but absolutely essential, to British commercial and political interests in Southern Asia.

To Mr. Colquhoun's book, Amongst the Shans (1885) Mr. Hallett contributed a "Historical Sketch of the Shans"; not perhaps a very satisfactory performance, but at least attesting an earnest desire to grapple with every aspect of the question, to the promotion of which he has devoted all his energies. In the present work, which stands on a much higher level of excellence, he weaves into a graphic account of an exploring survey in the very heart of Siam a vast amount of valuable information on the physical features, topography, social, religious, and political conditions of the Siamese empire and its vassal Shan States. For some occult reason, the year of this particular expedition is nowhere given, though months, days, and even hours are carefully recorded. Circumstances, however, seem to point to about the middle of the eighties; and January 21, when Mr. Hallett, accompanied by Dr. Cushing of the American Indo-Chinese Missions, left the neighbourhood of Maulmein for the Siamese Shan States, may safely be assigned to the year 1885 with possible error ± 1 , as the mathematicians put it. Elsewhere it is stated that Bangkok, the terminus of the expedition, was reached on June 28, so that rather over five months were occupied in covering the "thousand miles on an elephant," which, however, also included nearly 550 miles by water (Meping and Menam rivers) from Zimmé to Bangkok.

The land route, starting from Maing-lungyee in the Salwin basin, struck due east across the British and Siamese frontier to Maing Haut, above Raheng on the Meping. From this point it followed the Meping valley north to Zimmé (Xieng-mai, Chieng-mai, Kieng-mai, and other forms), capital of the most important Lao (Shan) State tributary to Siam. Here the traveller enjoyed the hospitality of the American missionaries, whose noble qualities and beneficent influence, especially among the non-Buddhist peoples of Burma and Siam, receive full recognition. Mr. Hallett was much struck by the high estimation in which they are held by the chiefs and their subjects in every part of the country.

"Not only were they on a kindly and friendly footing with them, but by their bold strictures upon acts of injustice, and by exposing and expostulating against the wickedness and senselessness of certain of the reigning superstitious, they had become a beneficent power in the country."

Zimmé formed a fresh starting-point of a circular or loop journey, which went first nearly due north through Kiang-hai to Kiang-hsen on the Mekong, at the frontier of the Burmese Shan states. This was the northernmost point reached by the expedition, which, after retracing its steps to Kiang-hai, branched off south-eastwards to Lakon, and so back to Zimmé, whence, as stated, Mr. Hallett made his way, by water, through Raheng to Bangkok. The careful survey of the ground made on this occasion appears to have suggested an important modification in the direction of the main line of railway from Lower Burma and Bangkok to China, as originally proposed by Messrs. Colquhoun and Hallett. Instead of running either from Rangoon or Maulmein direct to Zimmé, it is now proposed to carry it from Maulmein east to Raheng, where it would effect a junction with the line from Bangkok, and thence run through Lakon and Kiang-hsen north to Ssumao (Samok), the Chinese frontier station. Zimmé would thus be left a considerable distance to the west, but could be connected with the trunk line by a branch from Lakon. A study of the orographic system shows that this would be a decided improvement on the original plan, the short and comparatively easy line of 160 miles from Maulmein to Raheng sufficing to connect the whole of the Burmese network with the prospective Siamese main line and all its branches. The total length of the line from Maulmein to China would be only 700 miles, with a total rise of not more than 4500 feet. This statement alone suffices to put out of court the rival project of a line from Bhamó across the alpine and deeply ravined borderlands between North Burma and South-west China, advocated by pig-headed officialdom. Speaking of this wild scheme, Mr. Colborne Baber has trenchantly remarked:

"I do not mean that it is absolutely impossible to construct a railway. By piercing half-a-dozen Mount Oenis tunnels, and erecting a few Menai bridges, the road from Burma to Yunnan-fu [Tali-fu] could doubtless be much improved."

It was by similar official obstinacy and short-sightedness that the results of Col. Chesney's memorable Euphrates Expedition (1836) were rendered nugatory; and now it is too late for a British-controlled Euphrates Valley railway, for the Mesopotamian plains are already overshadowed by the Northern Colossus. It is earnestly to be hoped that Mr. Hallett is not fated to become the "Chesney" of the Meping-Menam valley, and that the Burmo-Siamese railway project, now thoroughly worked out, may not be pigeon-holed until it is again too late. The crow of the Gallic cock has already been heard in the "Siamese Mesopotamia."

Besides the battle of the rival railways, Mr. Hallett has unconsciously fought out the battle of the rival races. Though treated less methodically than the former subject, as was to be expected, the latter is none the less very ably discussed; and, wherever opportunity offers, prominence is given to the marked moral and physical superiority of the Shan peoples over the kindred but degenerate Siamese. For the future political consolidation and material development of Central Indo-China, this is an all-important consideration, and may ultimately mean a shifting of the political equilibrium from Bangkok to Zimmé.

Owing to the perplexing nomenclature, somewhat hazy notions prevail regarding the geographical position and mutual relation of these Indo-Chinese populations. A sufficiently clear idea attaches to the national names "Burmese" or "Cambojan." But when we come to "Siam," "Shan," "Lao," "Ngio," "Lueng," to say nothing of "Mon," "Talaing," "Peguan," "Lewa," "Kakye," "Chyen," "Chyn," &c., all is hopeless confusion. Even our author, in his historico-ethnological introduction, confuses "Cham" with "Siam," and applies both names to a hypothetical "small black race of the Malay stock, doubtless darkened by interbreeding with the Negrito aborigines, and perhaps with Dravidian colonists from the Madras coast." He does not seem to be aware that the Chams or Tsams, of whom a few still maintain a distinct national existence, were quite different from the Siamese, and that "Siam" itself is almost certainly the same word as "Shan." The word "Shan" is the most collective—anyhow, the most convenient—name of an immense ethnical family, which at one time occupied a great part of South and Central China, and which forms a most important element in the constitution of the present Chinese race, about fifty per cent. of whose language is in fact Shan. All the Lao, Ngio, and Lueng (Yai) peoples are also Shans, the difference between these names being purely political. Thus, the Siamese, as Mr. Hallett correctly remarks, call their Shan subjects "Lao" or "Lau." In the same way "Ngio" simply means the Shans formerly tributary to Burma, and consequently now British subjects, while "Lueng" or "Yai," with the honorific "Thai" or "Tai" ("great" or "noble"), comprises the numerous Shan communities within the Chinese frontier. Bearing in mind these distinctions and identities, the reader will have no difficulty in intelligently following Mr. Hallett in his discriminating remarks on the social and political condition of the various members of the wide-spread Shan race in the Indo-Chinese peninsula.

The British empire has been called "a fortuitous concurrence of atoms," in allusion to the unpremeditated—not to say, happy-go-lucky—way the incoegesta moles has been brought together. A case in point is mentioned by Mr. Hallett in connection with the visit of Mr. Bourne, of the Chinese Consular Service, to Ssumao in 1886. On this occasion it was luckily discovered that the Shan peoples just south of the Chinese station claimed to have always been Burmese subjects. It follows from the Notification of 1888 that they are now British subjects, and, consequently, that the route of the projected Burmo-Chinese railway traversing their territory can no longer be intercepted by the French extending the frontiers of their Annamese protectorate westwards. The situation is somewhat analogous to that in South Africa, where in the nick of time the British protectorate was extended to Matabele and Mashona Lands, thereby preventing the Portuguese, Boers, or Germans from intercepting the projected trunk-line from the Cape to the Zambesi, and thus safeguarding imperial interests over half a continent.

Interspersed among Mr. Hallett's itineraries are a considerable number of delightful Buddhist legends, which often illustrate the national wisdom and the marked sense of humour characteristic of the Shan peoples. Such are the myths of the gibbon, the crow and peacock, the cataracts, the Prince of Lakon over-anxious for a renewal of his youth, and others for which no room can here be found. In general, it is evident that Buddhism is little more than a veneer thinly spread over the old national belief in witchcraft, ghosts, demons, spirit mediums, omens, charms, incantations, and the like. Yet an adult Buddhist can never be induced to accept Christianity; and the missionaries appear to make no converts except among the Karens and other pagan or non-Buddhist peoples.

Attention should be called to the chapters on the state of things in Bangkok and in Lower Siam generally, where will be found a scathing denunciation of the utterly corrupt and oppressive Siamese administration. A government which is not merely based on the worst forms of feudalism, but which tends to reduce the bulk of the population to absolute slavery, must either mend its ways or cease to be.

Besides a general map showing the various railway projects, there is a series of excellent sectional maps of the route followed; also a number of rather thin illustrations, and an index.

The Poetry of Tennyson. By Henry Van Dyke. (Elkin Mathews.)

CONSIDERING the almost exhaustive way in which the Laureate has been discussed during the past forty years or so, it will not be taken as a disparagement of the latest book on the subject which America has sent us to say that its author has not succeeded in throwing any very novel flood of light upon the Tennysonian ethics or aesthetics. As regards the former, Lord Tennyson is too true and wise an artist to sow his garden with the thorn and briar of obstinate moral problems; hence, although his poetry is always rich in latent ethical suggestion, as all poetry of the first class must be, it is not a field for barren speculation as to ulterior intentions. It is quite possible that Tennyson may yet have his Ulrici, for the malice of the gods is capricious, and, happily for us, they evidently do not love him; but, so far, he has been spared Shakspeare's doom.

Under the other head—that of the Tennysonian aesthetics—Mr. Van Dyke cannot, without some qualification, be congratulated on his performance. He tells us that the comparative method in criticism is generally admitted to be one of the most fruitful—a large statement, which his own example hardly bears out. For our own part, we should say that the comparative method of criticism, as Mr. Van Dyke illustrates it, is distinctly one of the least fruitful; because the critic who is bent upon establishing some parallel between two authors has, for the time being, no eye for anything else, and the most salient aspects of the work he is considering are as nothing to the fanciful and unimportant resemblances to something else, which he is engrossingly occupied in detecting. Mr. Van Dyke takes up a whole chapter with an elaborate Macedon-Monmouth comparison between Tennyson and Milton, and it would be idle to pretend that this latest outcome of what we may venture to call the Fluellen school of criticism is a success. To bolster up a weak argument, he has to drag in such accidental matter as stray correspondences between the personal circumstances of the two poets; and, when these fail him, to fall back upon vaguely large propositions, telling us that "there is no closer parallel in literature than that between the early poems of Milton and Tennyson." Except that both had in an eminent degree that "Doric delicacy" which Wotton praised in "Comus," it is hard to see where the likeness comes in. Milton's early work was a further development of the Elizabethan vein, with the addition of Tuscan sweetness and Roman stateliness, and its spirit was thus essentially retrospective. Tennyson's early work, though superficially indebted to that of his immediate predecessors, was, in a far deeper sense, a prophecy, the herald note of a new age in art. When we come to close quarters, and try to find out from Mr. Van Dyke in what the Tennyson-Milton analogy really consists, we get very little satisfactory illumination. We are told that both poets are "marked by the same exact observation of nature," and the "Allegro" and "Penseroso" are called in to prove this assertion so far as it affects Milton. Now it is probably true that the accuracy and vigilance of Tennyson's eye for natural phenomena have never been equalled in any other poet since the world began; but Milton's landscape, as the late rector of Lincoln noted, is always more or less generalised, even if it be not half-conventional. We are not surprised that a writer who considers Coleridge to have had a defective ear should assume the existence of a similarity between Tennyson's and Milton's systems of versification. Few systems could have less in common, and, as a matter of fact, Tennyson's and Milton's are pre-eminently the two outstanding and entirely individual types of English blank verse; for, while Shakspeare's blank verse was a beautiful vehicle and nothing more—Shakspeare being indeed (not to speak it irreverently) an experimentalist to the very last, who in his latest plays practised a style of versification less admirable than that of his mid-period—their blank verse is in each case so idiosyncratic as to be always interesting as an artistic product for its own sake, apart from the matter it clothes. This is not the place to enter upon a detailed examination of Tennyson's metre; but take the following from a passage which Mr. Van Dyke himself quotes—

Suck'd from the dark heart of the long hills roll
The torrents"— and observe how the italicised line has a metrical movement quite different from anything which the whole of "Paradise Lost," "Paradise Regained," and "Samson Agonistes" can show. In other respects Mr. Van Dyke's parallel is hardly more workable. But it gives him an opportunity of saying some interesting things about Milton himself; and his remarks on Tennyson's alteration of "angel" to "seraph" in "The Palace of Art"—

"For there was Milton like a seraph strong"—

(he had originally been "like an angel tall") are an example of just and excellent criticism.

It now seems to not a few persons that the "Idylls of the King" are the one work of Tennyson's to which criticism will eventually assign a rather lower place than once appeared probable. Mr. Van Dyke does not share this view; and he combats Mr. Swinburne's disparagement of the "Idylls," without, however, invalidating the grounds upon which that disparagement was based. Mr. Swinburne, if we make due allowance for his highly emphasised way of putting things, will be found to have laid his finger on what actually is the weak spot in the Arthurian poems. Mr. Van Dyke, following his "comparative" method, hitches in Wagner somehow or other to illustrate his meaning; but apparently he does not see how Wagner makes against his case and supports Mr. Swinburne's. The "Tristan" and the "Parsifal" have just that quality of barbaric strength, shot through with barbaric voluptuousness, the absence of which so often makes the "Idylls" seem modern in tone, despite the archaic turns of diction, and decorative rather than heroic in design. These graceful, dignified figures, in suits of perfectly fitting armour, are seen to be rather wanting in the. The whole atmosphere, also, is less that of a rudely chivalric age than of an age when chivalry was becoming a tradition and a self-conscious ideal, tending to decline into an etiquette. And, apart altogether from the question whether or not we privately care for this impeccable Arthur, it is very doubtful if such a personality is congruous with any realisable conception of the character of his age. His paragon morality is surely of the sort which in such an age would almost have been distrusted as infringing unfairly upon the monopoly of immaculate virtue possessed by more officially constituted saints and anchorites. And, on other grounds, Mr. Swinburne's artistic instinct was certainly not at fault when he regretted that Tennyson, in rehandling the Mallorian epopee, did away with that initial sin of Arthur's which served as a kind of premonition of the eventual closing-in of retributive doom, and thus gave an impressive air of moral continuity to the whole sequence of events; for Tennyson thus chose to forego that sublimest of all tragic devices, the gradual loading of the air with a mysterious presentment from the first. Such a brooding of the end over the beginning—whereby, as we followed the fortunes of the king, we should all the while have been haunted by a subsensation of how, in Rossetti's weird phrase, his death was "growing up from his birth,"

"In a shadow-plant perpetually"— would certainly have supplied a fine element of spiritual grandeur, and would have fittingly prepared the way to that strange and terrible goal, the phantasmal last battle in the cold mist by the confines of "the winter sea." As it is, that scene is, at all events, as great as anything in modern poetry; but one may safely surmise that, if Tennyson had produced the "Idylls" in chronological consecutive-ness, their moral evolution would have been more manifestly organic than now.

No part of Mr. Van Dyke's book better deserves commendation than the chapter on Tennyson's "Historic Trilogy" of "The Making of England," as he happily calls it. Mr. Van Dyke recognises clearly enough, what the present writer has always felt to be true, that too many of us civilly cold-shouldered these splendid plays, for no better reason than because "Becket" and "Harold" were not "In Memoriam" and the "Idylls." It is to be regretted, however, that both here and elsewhere Mr. Van Dyke has imagined it his duty to give us his views of history so much at large. The ignobility of the Crimean War is not really germane to the question of the merit of "Maud" as a poem; and, even as a piece of historical character-painting, the passage in which he describes Thomas à Becket in a string of flashy Macaulayesque antitheses cannot be considered happy. The most interesting parts of his book are those in which he contents himself with the less ambitious task of tracing the Tennysonian stream up to its modest source in the volume of 1827. Since then the "Brook" has widened and deepened into a stately river, whose banks are princely gardens, statued with heroes and gods. The simile suggests the obvious and perhaps unprofitable criticism: the river, with all its amplitude, is a river, not the ocean; the statues, with their Pheidian faultlessness, are statues, not breathing figures; and the magnificent gardens are gardens, they are not the world.

The "Chronology" appended to this volume is excellent, so far as it goes. But its list of interesting contemporary references to Tennyson includes some which are, perhaps, not more important than others which it leaves out; and, in its enumeration of noteworthy magazine articles, &c., it should not have omitted Prof. Dowden's paper on "Mr. Tennyson and Mr. Browning"—an example of what "comparative" criticism ought to be.

A GREAT HEADMASTER.

A Memory of Edward Thring. By J. H. Skrine. (Macmillan.)

Edward Thring, Teacher and Poet. By H. D. Rawnsley. (Fisher Unwin.)

HERE are two books dealing with Edward Thring—two more books, one might say, if it were not ungracious to a great man and a great memory to hint that the two more are unnecessary or unwelcome. Neither the subject nor the manner of treatment in either case is less than admirable.

The English head-masters of this century are of the number of its peculiar glories; and we can hardly hear too much of those who have created for us so noble a tradition. It is true, and fortunate too, that they have, in the main, been happy in their chroniclers and critics, though possibly some writers have placed their heroes on rather high pedestals. And yet, after all, the world is not exclusively composed of superior persons who cannot lift their eyes to a higher level than their neighbours' soullery windows, to which the most modern "critical spirit" seems occasionally to limit its efforts. Mr. Skrine and Mr. Rawnsley, however, are not blind to the faults of their head-master. But before all things they make it clear that they loved and revered him; and those to whom he was nothing but a great name and far-away influence cannot doubt from what his pupils set down about him that he thoroughly deserved the love and reverence that follow him whither he can be followed by little else.

What those closest to Thring saw in him and admired must needs have been the qualities which made him a great and enduring personality; let us glance, then, at some of the main points on which the present writers dwell. As a teacher, he distinguished himself most consistently by claiming for himself full liberty to teach how and what he chose. First of all, he must be clear of state dictation; but state dictation, as embodied in large oblong envelopes and expressions of opinions from "my Lords" did not directly affect Thring's daily work. After his gladiatorial bout with the Endowed Schools Commissioners he was left discreetly alone. But a fragment of a letter quoted by Mr. Skrine will probably interest a good many pedagogues and possibly confirm some prejudices.

"My view is simple," Thring writes; "the skilled workman ought to be allowed uncontrolled management of the work. Governors ought to sanction his plan of work originally, and act as police afterwards to see that the work up to a fair average is honestly done. . . . No work can flourish over a series of years which is exposed to interference from local amateurs in authority."

Yet this pronouncement is fairly open to the charge of inconsistency with itself. Unless "local amateurs" are other than the governors who are to sanction and then inspect samples of work, Thring seems to invite and then to defy criticism from outside. And (be it said with all diffidence) he applied himself to the general question of state interference in public elementary schools like—an amateur, that is, an amateur in bureaucratism. Assuredly our present organisation was not to his mind; in his eyes it likened itself to the raising of mustard and cress by sprinkling seed over a bottle, the departmental minutes being the seed and teachers the resulting herbs. One may very safely say, however, that, deserved as is denunciation of the bureaucratic stiffness natural to bureaus, yet, if you want to have a great deal of mustard and cress in a hurry, sprinkling it in a damp place is not a bad way of getting it; and you must not complain if your mustard and cress is not as robust as a cedar of Lebanon. The country has made up its mind that its public elementary schools shall teach a great number of sciences and languages in an elementary and sloppy way; and the offices have set themselves with consummate skill and success to provide the machinery for the edifying process. They are not to blame; the nation is to blame for not having yet learnt to lay to heart the lessons of the Fallacy of Composition.

Thring most justly complained that our national character is "suffering loss in the training," because we are so faint-hearted in our public endeavours to make our children good and truthful and temperate and loving and patient by teaching them all these things. A great deal, it is true, can be taught by the way; but these are not the first things for which "managers" look in engaging their teachers—for public elementary schools, at least. They ask first, whether he got firsts or seconds in his class list, and whether he has three, four, five, or fifteen science certificates. Imagine the valuable intellectual and moral training that must be achieved in a case that can be quoted from a state not far from our own, and educationally constituted on similar lines. To wit; a young gentleman of Rohmboe (to use the language of high—i.e., Jajti diplomacy), in his twentieth year or thereabouts, writes to prove his fitness to enter a normal school: "I have sixteen science certificates," says he.

Of course, Thring was not the first man to preach that school surroundings should be as lovely as might be; but he certainly insisted on his theories being carried into practice with more success than many others who have shared his belief. And it is something due to him that all the world is beginning to agree that boorish and coarse furniture and walls will tell ill on those in habitual contact with them.

Above all things, however, Thring was a strong and masterful man—often hard and stern, it is true, but always filled with a sense of divine responsibility. That he was so strong a man explains the wonderful attachment of his boys; for he could do many things like the great man he was, playing fives with uncommon prowess, and troubling all the world with his hits to long on for threes.

Both of these books are of the kind called "eminently readable." Mr. Skrine's book is certainly a good deal more, being more informing than Mr. Rawnsley's, and of stouter texture; and truly he would be a pedagogue of skin more than usually thick who got no hints or inspiration from it. Although the plan of it is a little irregular, we obtain a very clear impression of the general course of Thring's history at Uppingham, and his heroic though somewhat solitary and combative spirit.

NEW NOVELS.

The New Prince Fortunatus. By William Black. In 3 vols. (Sampson Low.)

Lady Baby. By Dorothea Gerard. In 3 vols. (Blackwood.)

A Heavy Reckoning. By E. Werner. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

Colette. By Mrs. Macquoid. In 2 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

Forestalled. By M. Betham Edwards. (Spencer Blackett.)

The Peril of Richard Pardon. By B. L. Farjeon. (White.)

A Noble Woman. By Henry Gréville. (Chatto & Windus.)

SOME readers when beginning The New Prince Fortunatus may have felt a slight alarm lest Mr. Black should be going to give them a mere novel of what has been called "cabotinolatry"; or lest, on the other hand, he were about to satirise that somewhat ignoble cult elaborately. The former would have been terrible, and the latter disappointing—for Mr. Black's forte is scarcely satire, except of a mild and fugitive kind. Others, less original, may have dreaded the usual grouse-shoot, the usual deer-stalk, the usual salmon-kill, and the usual Highland maiden. With these latter persons we have never had any sympathy, for these things in Mr. Black's hands are very good things; and as for "usual," the sun and the moon are usual, too. Nearly everything that is good is usual; the business of life is to take the usual with a difference. We may as well say that there is no cause for alarm. To begin with, Mr. Black's cabotin is really a gentleman, and a good fellow, though not very strong- or long-headed; and Mr. Black does not expect us to worship him at all. In the second place, the touches of satire are not in the least overlaboured. In the third place, though the grouse-shoot, and the deer-stalk, and the salmon-kill, and the maiden, are all here, they occupy no exorbitant space, and are respectively a very nice grouse-shoot, deer-stalk, salmon-kill, and (especially) maiden. Mr. Black has not often drawn a more agreeable heroine than Honnor (the double n is repulsive to us) Cunyngham; nor has he or anyone else recently indicated better the fashion in which perfect good nature and unconcern in a girl may be mistaken, and that not merely by a coxcomb, for "encouragement." Lionel Moore is not at all a coxcomb, though he is a spoilt child; and his love-makings with Honnor (though doomed to misfortune, as the reader sees at once) are very good love-makings. His friend, Maurice Mangan, though he owes something of a debt to various ancestors, from George Warrington and Mr. Cunningham's Wynne downwards, is good too. And Kate Burgoyne, the cabotine, is good; and Lady Adela Cunyngham, a pattern of sanity on every subject but her own literary efforts, is very good. We do not much like the other heroine, Nina the Italian, but that is perhaps because we have a corrupted taste. There is one very funny figure, who is, we think, Mr. Black's masterpiece in that quiet kind of satire which, as we have said, he can do. This is Octavius Quirk, the log-roller, a kind of Bludyer-Bunthorne, whose sunflowers are steaks and onions—a toady of the aristocracy and a Social-Democrat. Quirk is one of the neatest skits on the craze about log-rolling ever done. It is especially good, inasmuch as Mr. Black has the ear of the British Philistine. The British Philistine will surely say to himself, even he, "Here is an impossible creature. Yet Mr. Black, who knows the merry sound of the rolled log as well as most men, says that is a log-roller. Done [the British Philistine does sometimes speak French] the log-roller is impossible." Which, indeed, is not quite the fact. But it is a better delusion than that which imagines fiends with logs rolling them like demoniac skittle-balls all day and all night for the benefit of scoundrels and over the feet and forms of honest men.

A writer like the author, or joint author of, Reata, who has gained her reputation and kept it almost wholly by studies of foreign life, runs a little risk when she comes to deal with English subjects; and it is, unfortunately, human nature to imagine that when, after two authors have written together, one of them writes alone there is sure to be some sign of inferiority. We humbly hope that much practice in criticism has given us some faculty of guarding against prejudices of this kind; and we have approached Lady Baby with all due exorcising of such demons and with nothing but a benevolent memory of satisfaction derived from Reata and Orthodox. The book begins in Scotland, a country where-with the author is known to have many connexions, and much of the scene continues to be laid there. The real heroine seems to us to be Maud Epperton, an impecunious damsel battered by many seasons, who is the black angel of the piece. An ineradicable, though no doubt inexcusable, fancy for black angels may be responsible for our liking her much better than Lady Baby (or Lady Frances Bevan, as her actual name is in the peerage of fiction). Lady Baby begins very well. Her scheme of "alphabet subjects," that is to say, of patiently trying a stranger with Athens, Miss Braddon, Crocodiles, and so on, till she hits the right one, is good fooling; and her unconventionality never in the least approaches—as unconventionality does constantly in novels and sometimes, we regret to say, in real life—anywhere near vulgarity. Her lover, Sir Peter Wyndhurst, who is thought to be a milksop and is a hero, deserves much commendation; and her father, Lord Kippen-dale, though slight, is good throughout. But her conduct to the said lover is not so much pretty Fanny's as silly Fanny's way, and is chiefly irritating. One of the causes or occasions of it, Laurence Carbury, a blasé and ravagé spendthrift of forty, is mere leather and prunella; and Lady Baby's brother Germaine, who falls in love with Maud Epperton and cuts himself adrift from her because he discovers she once told him a story, is as unnatural in his simplicity as Carbury in his Byronism. The introduction of an escaped panther reminds us too strongly of the immortal occasion when Pip, Miss Havisham, and Estella (or was it Pip and Estella only?) marched round the room with flags while the dogs ate veal cutlets; and all the business of the "Choughshire" copper mines (why follow a very silly practice of George Eliot's? why not say Cornwall?) is confused, theatrical, and ill-digested. Here we seem to be cursing Lady Baby roundly; but, in fact, its first volume is one of the most readable things we have recently come across, and there is interest and merit throughout. Perhaps it is Miss Gerard's ill-treatment of Maud that stirs our bile. It is not poetical justice which, for the sake of a mere fib or two (the just prerogative of her sex) condemns a very agreeable young woman, after a youth of penury, visiting, and a detestable aunt, to an age of soap-boiling husband. Let us hope that the soap-boiler and the foolish little Lady Baby both had the good feeling to die, and that Sir Peter and Maud "drew up together" after all.

A Heavy Reckoning ranks among the books in which, though there is no great fault to be found with them, we own that we find ourselves unable to take much interest. Something may be due to the irritating habit of giving English prefixes to foreign names. The whole scenery and the whole dramatis personae of A Heavy Reckoning are Swiss; yet we read of "Miss" Nordheim and "Mrs." Gersdorf, who, most absurd of all, has been "Lady Wally Ernsthausen." Considering that this latter young lady's papa is Baron Ernsthause, it would have been difficult to make a richer muddle of error; and as these things necessarily occur on every page, they keep up the worry. "Lady Wally" herself, a kind of madcap, is the most attractive figure in the book; but it is all estimable enough, though, as we have said, not to us interesting.

Mrs. Macquoid's Cosette is one of those studies in the ordinary life of French or French-speaking countries in which the author delights, and which she executes very well. In Cosette the scene is Dinant and its neighbourhood, and a very nice scene too. The heroine has two lovers—one who is young and beautiful, the other who is a middle-aged chef. With a delicate feeling for those of the other sex who are not young and beautiful, even if they have not the honour or dishonour of being chefs, Mrs. Macquoid makes the young man false and not triumphant; the old one triumphant and true.

It is not usual for books to appear in "railway" form for the first time; and, therefore, we presume, though there is no other indication of the fact, and though we do not remember it in two or three-volume shape, that Forestalled has previously made its bow to the public. "The Double Forestalment" would, perhaps, be a more exact title; for the story (which is, indeed, a little improbable), goes to show that, whereas an old man forestalled a young one in securing not merely the hand, but the affections, of a girl, the young one forestalled the old in certain scientific discoveries. This is pleasant topsy-turvation enough; but Miss M. Betham Edwards has treated it at rather more length than it will bear. Our own moral—a base one doubtless—would be that, though there is not a stain on the honour of Nella, the young lady in question, it is neither wise from the point of view of Aphrodite nor from that of Pallas to admit into your household an "adopted brother" of your wife's who is much younger than yourself.

Mr. Dickens and Mr. Wilkie Collins are dead, more's the pity; but Mr. B. L. Farjeon is still with those who like a certain kind of story in which the one showed genius and the other talent. Of this kind of story it is difficult for the reviewer to say anything; for there is nothing but the story itself to talk about, and, if he does talk about it, both author and readers thirst for his blood. We can only say that we wish we had a dear uncle who went about with five thousand pounds in gold and notes handy. We would not kill him, or let him be killed; we would "cherish" him, as Mr. Thackeray avowed that he would do with an aunt of even less obvious attractions.

Mr. Vandam's translation from Henry Gréville, under the title of A Noble Woman, is a fair example of a rather difficult and extremely thankless class of work. Elegance Mr. Vandam does not attain unto; and perhaps elegance is not to be expected, as it was in the days when Carlyle and others "did" translations. Accuracy (which is too often lacking) is very fairly attained by him. As for the original, Mme. Durand never does bad work; and, when she has Russian subjects (as here), seldom work that is not observed straight from the life.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

CLASSICAL SCHOOL-BOOKS.

Curtius' Griechische Schulgrammatik. By W. von Hartel.

Uebungsbuch zum Uebersetzen ins Griechische. By K. Schenkl.

Griechisches Uebungsbuch I. By W. Hensell.

Lateinisches Schulgrammatik. By A. Scheindler.

Lateinisches Uebungsbuch I. By A. Scheindler.

Lateinische Uebungssätze zur Casuslehre. By W. Eymmer. (Wien und Prag: Tempsky; London: Williams & Norgate.)

As a general rule, school books have a very limited interest for foreigners. One cannot exactly sit down and read them; one cannot adopt them in schools, for they are written in a different language; one cannot even translate them, for they are usually based on different educational systems. But the six Austrian school books named above deserve, perhaps, a brief notice, for they represent what is practically a new departure in Austrian classical education. How far this is due to Dr. von Gautsch, the energetic minister of education at Vienna, how far to the increasing interest in classical studies, visible in series like the Wiener Studien, we do not know. But it is pretty plain that, for some little time, Austrian scholars have been trying to improve their school books; and it may be worth while shortly to point out to English readers the chief features of their work. Some of these features will not seem very new or strange to English readers; on the contrary, here, as elsewhere, English editors, and still more English teachers, have anticipated much that is only just beginning to find a place in German and Austrian school books. And there is a good deal that is not exactly "new" matter in those school-books. The first of these features is an attempt to connect the different books together. That an exercise or a reading book should be based on a grammar is, of course, nothing new; but the writers mentioned above have gone further. Thus, Dr. Scheindler's Latin Grammar is intended to be an exact parallel to Dr. Hartel's Greek Grammar; and the agreement is so complete that, where the rules are the same for Greek and for Latin, the wording is also the same. Secondly, there is, in all these books, a definite effort to minimise the amount to be learnt. Dr. Hartel's revision of Curtius is, in some places, practically an abridgement. Dr. Scheindler has discovered, by the aid of statistics, that the supines and the passive future infinitive (amatum iri) occurs very rarely in the portions of classical authors usually read by beginners. He has, therefore, cut it out, inserting, instead of the supines, the perfect passive participle. So far as we know, he is the first writer who has actually done this, though English schoolmasters have not waited for Dr. Scheindler's statistics to forbid the use of amatum in ordinary prose, and to be very cautious in passing amatum iri. It is, however, decidedly more satisfactory to have the unusual forms removed from the print which beginners commit to memory. Thirdly, all the writers seem to agree in the view that the exercise must be based on the reading, though there seems to be some difference in method. One prints a number of stories in Greek of interesting contents, à la Sidgwick and Morice—only the contents would very often not interest an English boy—and then adds exercises which practically reproduce the original Greek. Another follows the plan of leaving this to the teacher, who writes his own exercises on the "books" read in form. Both plans are well known in England, though the latter is far the commoner, and, we think, probably the better. Fourthly, and it is here that the German books before us most certainly excel the English, the requirements of philology are attended to. While we in England have been hesitating whether or not to adopt the new philology, and have, in general, refrained from doing so in our elementary books, Dr. Hartel has revised Curtius' Grammar, and accepted the latest results, so far as they are suitable for teaching purposes. There are many other points of detail which deserve notice in these books, but the four features indicated seem to us the main ones, on account of which we have noticed the books in the way we have done.

Xenophons Memorabilien. By A. Weidner.

Ausgewählte Gedichte des Ovidius. By H. S. Sedlmayer.

Demosthenes Ausgewählte Reden. By K. Wotke.

Schulcommentar zu Demosthenes's Staatsreden. By A. Baran.

Homer's Ilias in verkürzter Ausgabe. By A. Christ. (Wien und Prag: Tempsky; London: Williams & Norgate.)

These five texts proceed from the same publishers, and mutatis mutandis represent the same principles as the Grammars and Exercise Books noticed above. The texts have, in each case, been revised in accordance both with scholarship and common sense. Difficult or hopeless passages are omitted, and the whole so arranged as to be within a boy's capacity. The result is that, though one volume of notes has been given, notes are really superfluous. We should like to suggest to English teachers that it is quite possible for them to avail themselves of these cheap and well-printed texts, and thus avoid the evil which is said—not wholly without truth—to arise from the rather superfluous amount of help which editors generally give. We are sorry to see even one volume of notes among the books before us. Not that the notes are particularly bad, though they are hardly up to our standard. But we do not think that, with a carefully revised text, notes ought to be needed. We wish that English publishers would give us a few such books.

Passages for Practice in Translation at Sight. Part iv., Greek. By John Williams White. (Boston, U.S.: Ginn.) Prof. White, of Harvard, has realised and acted upon a fact which has insufficiently dawned upon us in England—the fact that, to get real advantage from a classical training, it is necessary to read the classical literature largely, freely, and at sight; not, of course, without grammatical training, but yet in a more literary spirit than is commonly adopted. For some reason or other, our English training fails in this. Ten or twelve years of Greek and Latin, with us, leaves even able youths scarcely competent to read these languages at sight. We need something more of Macaulay's way of reading classics, and modern languages too. Prof. White would achieve the object by much reading—reading aloud (Introd., p. xvi.)—of unseen passages from the best authors. The present volume is, we gather, chronologically the first, but intellectually the fourth. Part i. is to contain extracts from writers of the simpler Attic prose; part ii. will be devoted to extracts from Herodotus and Homer; and these two parts are for boys preparing for admission to Harvard. Part iii. deals with Lysias, Demosthenes, Plato, Homer, Euripides, and Aristophanes; while part iv., the present volume, omits Lysias, but adds to the "bill of fare" of part iii. Xenophon, Herodotus, Thucydides,

NOTES AND NEWS.

Sophocles, and Aeschylus, and, with part iii., is intended for preparation for "Second Year Honours" at Harvard. The reading aloud is to be tested eventually, but not normally, by the power of translating the piece on paper. The main use of the selections is to be oral—by question, hint, note, and exercise of memory and thoughtful conjecture. We should greatly like to hear the book worked by a skilled teacher on this plan. The extracts from Demosthenes are somewhat too scanty; we think the De Corona deserved to be drawn upon. Those from Plato are also too few to be adequate; but those from Thucydides (pp. 44-76) are excellent; and the four dramatic poets—Euripides, Sophocles, Aristophanes, and Aeschylus—are represented by interesting extracts. If, however, a chorus of Sophocles (pp. 121-2) is admissible, part of an Aeschylean chorus should surely appear—say, the Iphigenia episode in the first chorus of the Agamemnon.

Selection from the Greek Tragedians. By E. D. Stone. (Rivingtons.) Mr. Stone is of opinion that "the drama, being the most complex and artificial presentment of human action, is for this very reason less fitted for immature intellects, especially when the difficulties of translation make it impossible to read more than a limited portion at a time. A boy likes a story, and is comparatively indifferent to the development of character."

There is much truth in this plea. A Greek play does hang heavy in the hands with beginners. A consciousness that a story was needful has caused the otherwise highly injudicious plan of practically beginning Greek with Homer, as we all did thirty years ago. But, after all, beginners, if carefully and pleasantly instructed, soon cease to be beginners. It is surprising to see how soon a boy of fair capacity will catch up the "note" of a character, and be interested in its development. Mr. Stone, however, has undoubtedly put together a number of interesting and stimulating passages from the three great Greek tragedians—five from Aeschylus, ten from Sophocles, twenty-two from Euripides. Notes are appended, at the end of the book, for each passage, with an exposition of the dramatic situation. For our part, we think Aeschylus, in narrative, easier than Sophocles, and should have inserted more than five extracts from his dramas—certainly one, if not more, from the Agamemnon, and part of the opening of the Eumenides. From Euripides, we think the Iphigenia in Aulis has been unduly neglected. The opening scene should certainly have been presented by an editor who does not shrink (see p. 118) from giving anapaestic passages. But the idea of the book is a good one, and the notes and introductions commendable.

Legends of Ancient Rome from Livy. By Herbert Wilkinson. (Macmillan.) We can heartily commend both the design and execution of this little book. It consists of selections from Livy, adapted to beginners by the omission of difficult passages and constructions, but still retaining the characteristics of the original. When contrasted with the arid and clumsy paragraphs of Eutropius, which we are sorry to find is used in High Schools for Girls, we can testify from experience that the forcible and rich style of Livy positively attracts children to the study of Latin. For what boy is there who would not burn to read on a section beginning "Aulus Postumius dictator, Titus Aebutius magister equitum." Our only complaint against the notes is that they are not sufficiently numerous; and there is a bad blunder in the Vocabulary in the rendering of nepos, from which it would appear that the Vocabulary has been (partly at least) compiled from the Fish Index.

MR. F. G. FRAZER, of Trinity College, Cambridge—whose wide learning is hitherto known only by his article on "Totemism" in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and by stray papers in the Transactions of societies—will shortly publish with Messrs. Macmillan a work in two volumes, entitled The Golden Bough: a Study in Comparative Mythology. Mr. Frazer, we believe, is now in Greece, carrying out investigations on the spot for an elaborate edition of Pausanias.

MR. ANDREW LANG'S new book, Old Friends: Essays in Epistolary Parody, will be published in a few days by Messrs. Longmans. Some of the papers, but not all, have already appeared in the St. James's Gazette.

MR. W. HEINEMANN will shortly issue Arabic Authors: a Manual of Arabian History and Literature, by Mr. F. F. Arbuthnot, author of "Persian Portraits."

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have been encouraged by the success of their sixpenny edition of Charles Kingsley's novels to issue Tom Brown's School-Days in the same form, with the illustrations by Mr. Arthur Hughes and Mr. Sydney P. Hall. It will be ready in May.

THE next volume in the series of "English Men of Action" will be Sir Henry Havelock, written by Mr. Archibald Forbes.

MR. W. H. DAWSON, of Skipton—the author of "German Socialism and Ferdinand Lassalle"—has just finished a companion volume on Prince Bismarck and State Socialism, which will be published by Messrs. Sonnenschein & Co. in their series of monographs on social science.

MR. JOSEPH HATTON'S serial story, By Order of the Czar—which deals with Nihilistic plots, as well as with the persecution of the Jews in Russia—will be published in volume form by Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. in the course of April.

A new volume of essays by Mr. Edward Butler, author of "For Good Consideration," entitled A Consideration of Gentle Ways, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. will publish shortly a new book, entitled New Life: Its Genesis and Culture, by the authors of "Our Nurses, and the Work they have to do."

MR. FRANK MURRAY, of Derby, promises shortly two new volumes in his "Moray Library": No. XI., Verses Essays, by Mr. Reginald Brimley Johnson; and No. XII., The Book Bills of Narcissus, by Mr. Richard Le Gallienne.

MESSRS. GRIFFITH FARRAN & Co. propose to follow up their sixpenny reprint of the late W. H. G. Kingston's The Three Midshipmen with a uniform issue of Peter the Whaler.

THE first edition of the Life of the Rev. J. G. Wood, by his son, the Rev. Theodore Wood, published this week by Messrs. Cassell, has been already exhausted. A second edition is in preparation, and will be ready in a few days.

AT a recent meeting of the "Sette of Odd Volumes," Mr. Charles Holme, who lately accompanied Mr. Alfred East in his artistic tour in Japan, was elected president; Mr. Alexander Hollingsworth, of Engineering, vice-president; and Mr. John Lane, secretary. The latter has in the press a bibliography of the works of George Meredith, and is well known as a book-plate collector.

MR. JOHN GALWEY—for some years past with Messrs. Sotherton—has begun business as a new and second-hand bookseller in Garrick Street, Covent Garden. He promises to pay special attention to bookbinding.

THE valuable library formed by the late John Lovell, editor of the Liverpool Mercury—which is particularly rich in Shaksperian literature—will shortly be sold. The catalogue contains a portrait, and a reprint of the obituary notice written by Mr. Hall Caine.

ON Tuesday and Wednesday of next week, Messrs. Sotherton will sell "portions" of two libraries, which are very characteristic of their English and French ownership. The English collection is that of Mr. James Sinclair, and consists mainly of first editions of Dickens and Thackeray and other moderns, and of books illustrated by Cruikshank, Rowlandson, Phiz. A curious entry is this (No. 260): "The Breton Glasses at Orleans, edited by Whiteley Stokes." The French collection, which is described as that of a baron lately deceased, is also largely composed of illustrated works; but these are the magnificent copper-plates of the last century, adorning large-paper editions of La Fontaine, Beaumarchais, Dorat, Retif de la Bretonne, &c.

AT the meeting of the National Indian Association on Monday next, March 31, at the Westminster Town Hall, Mr. Frederick Harrison will deliver a lecture on "Some Great Books of History."

AT the meeting of the Honourable Society of Cymmrodorion on Wednesday next, April 2, a paper will be read on "Welsh Place-Names," by Prof. J. E. Lloyd, of Aberystwyth, the editor of Hubert Lewis's The Ancient Laws of Wales.

PROF. JAGIO' of Vienna, has just edited, with a preface, a document interesting to all students of Slavonic history and philology. It is a chrysobull of King Stephen Urosh II., given in the year 1318 to a church dedicated to St. Stephen the Martyr, and was found by Prof. Vambéry in the old Seraglio at Constantinople. Prof. Jagio' tells us that great pains have been taken to make the copy exact, since this edition must supply the place of the MS. to Slavonic students, as the original will shortly be sent back to Constantinople.

THE sixth volume of the Collected Writings of De Quincey, just issued by Messrs. A. & C. Black, of Edinburgh, contains the famous series of essays (originally contributed to Blackwood) which treat of Homer and Herodotus, Cicero and the Caesars. It is curious that De Quincey, with all his pride as a Hellenist, was uniformly less happy in dealing with Greece than with Rome. But as regards the papers on the Caesars, we cordially agree with Prof. Masson's judgment that, despite all their defects, they form "perhaps the most vivid panoramic sketch of the imperial history to the found in our language." In these days of minute accuracy, it seems noteworthy that De Quincey's latest editor has not thought it worth while to provide accents to his Greek, nor even to correct his strange misquotation (p. 202):

"Exoriare aliquis nostrum de sanguine vindex."

WITH reference to the notice in the ACADEMY of last week of Mr. James Hogg's Uncollected Writings of De Quincey (Sonnenschein), a correspondent calls our attention to the fact that more of the papers than we then mentioned have previously been reprinted. Mr. Page, in his Life and Writings of De Quincey (1877), gave at length those on "Malthus's Measure of Value" and "Anglo-German Dictionaries," as well as the letter to the editor of the Instructor about his portrait. Still, this does not affect our main statement that Mr. Hogg has placed all lovers of De Quincey under an obligation, by bringing together in these two volumes a great deal (though not of the first importance) that was hitherto unknown.

WE have received the first number of the Journal of the Scottish Mountaineering Club (Edinburgh: The Darien Press), which has been founded on the model of the Alpine Club, "to encourage mountaineering in Scotland in winter [which apparently includes spring] as well as summer." Another rule declares that "the members of the club shall respect proprietary and sporting rights, and endeavour to obtain the co-operation of proprietors." In this connexion it is noticeable that the honorary president of the club is Cameron of Lochiel. This number of the Journal contains the address of the president, Prof. Ramsay of Glasgow; and several papers describing winter ascents.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE forthcoming number of Mind will contain an elaborate article by Dr. Henry Maudsley, on "The Cerebral Cortex and its Work," and an address on "The Progress of Philosophy," by Dr. James Ward.

THE April number of the Art Magazine will contain the first of two articles upon "Portraits of Robert Browning," written by Mr. W. M. Rossetti, whose acquaintance with the poet goes back for more than thirty-five years. The total number of portraits that have been lent for reproduction is twenty-one. The same number will also have an illustrated article on "Hameln, the Town of the Pied Piper," by Mrs. Katherine M. Macquoid.

MRS. ANDREW CROSSIE contributes to Temple Bar an article on "John Kenyon and his Friends," which is full of literary reminiscences of the early half of the century.

Scribner's for April will contain the second of the articles entitled "In the Footprints of Charles Lamb," with illustrations by Mr. John Fulleylove and Mr. Herbert Railton.

THE principal article in the forthcoming Portfolio will be a critical description of the work of Mr. Onalof Ford, with a full-page plate and minor illustrations.

In the April number of Time there will be articles on "Irish Literature," by Mr. Justin McCarthy; on "The Horses of the Pampas," by Mr. Cunningham Graham; and on "The Foreign Policy of Russian Tsardom," by Mr. F. Engels.

The Art Review for April and May will contain an historical poem, based on the story of Mary, daughter of King Stephen, from the pen of Mr. Compton Reade.

IN MEMORIAM.

SIR HENRY YULE.

"Moriturus vos saluto."

Breathes his last the dying scholar—
Tireless student, brilliant writer;
He "salutes his age," and journeys
To the undiscovered country.

There await him with warm welcome
All the heroes of old story—
The Venetians, the Ca Polo,
Marco, Nicolo, Mappeo,
Odoric of Pordenone,
Ibn Batuta, Marignolli, Benedict de Goës—"seeking Lost Cathay and finding heaven."
Many more whose lives he cherished,
With the piety of learning;
Fading records, buried pages,
Falling lights and fires forgotten,
By his energy recovered,
By his eloquence rekindled.

"Moriturus vos saluto."

Breathes his last the dying scholar,
And the far-off ages answer:
"Immortales te saluant."

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

WE have to welcome the first number of Folk-Lore: a Quarterly Review of Myth, Tradition, Institution, and Custom (David Nutt), incorporating the Archæological Review and the Folk-Lore Journal, which latter succeeded the Folk-Lore Record. From the sub-title, as well as from the editorial note, it appears that a distinct attempt is being made to extend the definition of "folk-lore"—a word itself little more than forty years old—so as to include what is called "institutional archæology," further explained as the study of "the origin and development of institutions other than those brought into existence by the direct action of the State." It happens that the subject of the most notable article in the present number can hardly be brought within even this elastic definition. This is Prof. Ridgeway's paper on "The Greek Trade-Routes to Britain," in which he subjects to careful criticism the fragmentary evidence that has come down to us in Strabo, &c., and on many points opposes the views of Mr. Elton. His general conclusion is that there were two trade routes between Massalia and Britain. The first passed across France to Corbilo, at the mouth of the Loire, and thence by sea round Brittany to the Isle of Wight, which is the Ictis of Diodorus Siculus, the Vectis of Ptolemy, the Mictis of Pliny. The other route was northwards to the Straits of Dover. Elaborate arguments are adduced to prove that the former was the earlier route, the most ingenious being that derived from the evidence of coins. The entire paper is eminently worth reading, even though all its conclusions may not be accepted. For the rest we must be content to mention Mr. Andrew Lang's presidential address to the Folk-Lore Society; the first instalments of two papers—"Magic Songs of the Finns," by the Hon. J. Abercromby, and "Legends from Torres Straits," by Prof. A. C. Haddon; an excellent summary of recent research on Teutonic mythology, by Mr. F. York Powell; and a carefully compiled bibliography. The tabulation of folk-tales is also continued. The Notes and News give promise of some interesting publications, both in future numbers of the review and also in independent volumes.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MICTIS.

Settlington, York: March 2^d, 1890.

In his essay on "The Greek Trade Routes to Britain," in the current number of Folk-Lore (David Nutt), Prof. Ridgeway has given some good reasons for identifying Vectis, which indubitably denotes the Isle of Wight, with the island of Mictis, mentioned in a passage of Timæus, quoted by Pliny. He conjectures that the reading "Mictis" is the blunder of a transcriber. How the blunder arose can, I think, be easily explained. Pliny doubtless made his notes, or even the rough copy from which his work was transcribed, in the old Roman cursive, which we know chiefly from the business memoranda of the Pompeian banker, L. Caecilius Iucundus, which were discovered in 1875. In this Roman cursive "Mictis" and "Vectis" would be almost undistinguishable. The letter m would be represented by three separated and nearly vertical strokes, and i by one. The letter v would be represented by two such strokes, and e by two more. Thus Mi would be written ||| and Ve ||||. Hence Pliny, in referring to the cursive notes he had made from Timæus, could easily misread "Mictis" for "Vectis."

In the modern German cursive script, which curiously reproduces some of the ambiguities of the old Roman cursive, ve might easily be mistaken for mi, save for the diacritical signs over u and i, which are of comparatively recent introduction.

As the Britons paddled their coracles to "Mictis" from Cornwall, or more probably from Devon, in six days, and supposing they were able to paddle eighteen or twenty miles a day, the Isle of Wight would suit the conditions better than any other island that has been proposed; while the distance from the Isle of Wight to the nearest point of the French coast is only about half the distance from St. Michael's Mount.

ISAAC TAYLOR.

CHAUCER'S REFERENCE TO DIOGENES.

Cambridge: March 24, 1890.

In my edition of Chaucer's Minor Poems I was unable to give the source of Chaucer's reference to Diogenes in the poem of "The Former Age," st. 5. But here it is:

"Diogenes tyrannos et subversores urbium, bellaque vel hostilia vel civilia, non pro simplid victu clerum promorumque, sed pro carnibus et epularum delictis asserit excitari."—Joh. Salisburienſis, Polarisations, lib. viii., c. 6.

I find, too, that John of Salisbury copied this (changing subversiones into subversores) from Jerome's Epistle against Jovinian, lib. iii.

WALTER W. SKEAT.

CANYNGE AND ROWLEY.

City Library, Bristol: March 27, 1890.

As Prof. W. Skeat remarks in his letter (ACADEMY, March 22), that he is "open to correction" in point of his animadversions on Chatterton inconsistently, as he thinks, representing William Canynge, the builder of St. Mary Redcliffe, as both merchant and priest, I may say that Chatterton was correct.

Canynge, tired of worldly affairs, was ordained acolyte, September 19, 1467. He shortly after became deacon; and on April 16 in the following year was consecrated priest, his first mass being sung at St. Mary Redcliffe. He subsequently became dean of the college of Westbury-on-Trym, two miles north of Bristol, which college he helped to rebuild. In the church of Redcliffe are, as described by Camden, two recumbent monuments to his memory, one representing him as merchant and the other as ecclesiastic.

As respects Rowley, he was not a priest, but merchant and sheriff of Bristol. This Thomas Rowley, the chief member of the family, died on January 30, 1478; and in the nave of St. John Baptist's Church, whose spire stands above the remaining porticullised gateway of Bristol, is a brass to his memory and that of his wife. There is no account of any priest or poet of that name connected with Bristol churches, and the Rowley of Chatterton was Chatterton himself (see Bristol, Past and Present, Nicholls & Taylor, Vol. II.).

JOHN TAYLOR.

St. Bede's, College, Manchester: March 18, 1890.

Prof. Skeat, while raising the question whether William Canynge, of Bristol, was or was not a priest, asks:—"Was it usual for priests to know their own business so badly that they were in the habit of appointing chantry priests to pray for their souls?" No doubt Prof. Skeat has other and better grounds for his hypothesis; but the above words seem to imply some slight misapprehension of the work of the chantry priests. The office of the chantry priest was undoubtedly, as Mr. Skeat says, "to pray for souls." But this prayer for souls, in the vast majority of cases, included a whole set of definite and daily duties. It usually meant a definite work to be done at a definite place and at a definite time. For instance, it required the priest to offer his Mass for certain souls (their "good estate" if living, their "repose" if departed thence) at a given altar, in some cases at a given hour each day of the week. In ordinary circumstances a priest could offer but one Mass each day, and if this Mass were offered in fulfilment of an obligation—such as to pray for certain specified souls—it could not be devoted simultaneously to any other purpose or "intention." Thence priests having cure of souls, and bound by the fact to offer their Mass on all Sundays and holidays for the good of their parishioners, would be debarred in most cases from accepting chantry work, by which their Mass would be demanded for a different and limited intention. Then it is to be remembered that chantry work not only claimed the Mass of the chantry priest for the purpose of the chantry, but often laid under contribution a fair portion of his day by requiring him to say the Office of the Dead, the Placebo and Dirige, and the Commendations which figure so frequently in the wills and deeds of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries. It will be readily understood that to discharge such obligations at a given place and hour daily constituted a tie upon residence and a drain upon time which many of the clergy, engaged in higher and wider spheres of usefulness, would find to be incompatible with the duties of their benefice. Any priest so placed wishing to found or fill a chantry would very naturally look about for some "convenient preste," as some of the old deeds express it, to undertake the post. His doing so surely need not bring with it the suspicion that "he knew his own business badly" any more than the fact of employing a secretary need imply that the employer is illiterate. A host of learned bishops—such as William Wyckham of Winchester, William Booth of York, de Kilkeny of Ely; Stapledon of Exeter; Winchelsey of Canterbury—founded chantries in which priests were to offer and pray for their souls. Booth even composed the Collect to be used for his own chantry.

As to Prof. Skeat's question whether the majority of chantry priests were not usually appointed by laymen, the answer, I take it, will probably be found in the negative. Would not the Canon Law which obtained in England require that all chantries founded per modum tituli should be filled either by collation by the bishop or by his institution on the presentation of the founder? The constitution of Winchelsey and the gloss of Lyndwood also seem to imply the working of the common law of the Church by the words "post admissionem." An exception to this arrangement would be found in chantry foundations known as "mercenary" (see Ferrari's Bibliotheca Canonica, Capellania); but these would form, I presume, but a very small part of the English chantries.

J. MOYES.

P.S.—Is the William Canynge to whom Prof. Skeat refers the same who is buried in St. Mary Redcliffe's, Bristol, and whose effigy is given in Rock's Church of our Fathers, Vol. II., p. 58? If so, would not the dress, and especially the stole, be evidence of his priesthood?

A LEGEND OF ABRAHAM.

London: March 25, 1890.

It is possible that the legend cited by Mr. Whitley Stokes has had even a more extensive journey than from Palestine to Ireland. The episode of "Strong, Stronger, Strongest," as I have ventured to call it, is found in Indian fable apart from any theological reference. Thus, in what is most probably the Indian original of the fable of "The Cat turned into a Maiden," a Brahmin who has changed a mouse to a maiden determines to wed her to the most powerful being he can find. The sun confesses that the clouds can obscure him, the clouds that winds disperse them, the winds that mountains can withstand them, and finally the mountain confesses inferiority to the mice that burrow in its vitals. So the maiden marries the ridiculous mouse, and the moral of that is, "Nature will out." In a Jewish legend about Abraham, also quoted by Beer (Leben Abrahams, p. xi. and note 92), this fable is utilised in a discussion between Abraham and Nimrod; fire should not be worshipped because water can quench it, nor water because the clouds can carry it, nor the clouds because the winds bear them, nor the winds as even man can withstand them. The general idea of the two legends is the same, and much of the detail, so that there is every probability that the two are historically connected, especially as we know that the Indian fable reached Greece as early as 400 B.C., being then quoted by the dramatist Strattis (Meineke Frag. Com. 441 cf. my Aesop pp. 28, 97, 101). I have shown in my Aesop that there was an earlier influence of Indian fable in Jewish literature to which I attribute the remarkable Indian parallels of Proverbs xxx. The further amplification in the particular legend quoted by Mr. Stokes bears the stamp of theological systematisation.

As regards the question whence the Irish monk got his reference to the story, we may at once dismiss the idea, I think, of its being due to any mediation of Jews so early as the seventh century; their influence came later. I am unable to guess what Dr. Schiller Szinessy was thinking of in tracing the story among Western Jews so early as the fifth century. There is an Italian Hebrew version of Josephus known as "Josippon," but this is usually dated about the ninth or tenth century.

On the other hand, Latin versions of Josephus were favourite reading in the scriptoria of cathedrals and monasteries. In England at any rate scarcely a single early book-list is without a Josephus. It was from the Latin Josephus, for example, that William of Newbury got the fine speech that he puts in the mouth of the Jews of York sub anno 1190.

THE CLAIMS OF HOBBS TO THE DARWINIAN STRUGGLE FOR LIFE.

La Nouvelle Revue, Paris: March 21, 1890.

No sooner had Darwin succeeded in getting the scientific world to accept the evolution theory than people proceeded to search through their libraries with a view to discover Darwin's precursor, and from Lamarck, Goethe, and Darwin senior went back to Aristotle. Now that this historical work has been accomplished for the theory in general, men are beginning to do the same for the Darwinian theory of the struggle for life, that all-important factor in the development of organised matter. Would you allow me to use the columns of the ACADEMY to make good the claims of Thomas Hobbes, the great logician who, with unexampled vigour, applied the deductive method of geometry to philosophical thought?

Hobbes, like a true geometer, begins by laying down two axioms: (1) Nature hath made men equal in the faculties of the body and mind. (2) Nature gives to every man the right to all things. Each man hath by the right of Nature the liberty to use his own powers, as he will himself, for the preservation of his own nature—that is to say, of his own life; and, consequently, the liberty of doing anything which in his own judgment and reason he shall conceive to be the aptest means thereunto.

These two axioms once established, Hobbes goes on with iron logic to draw deductions therefrom; and, having surveyed the wild desires and passions of men, whose fiercest actions "are no sins, there is no law that forbids them," he arrives from deduction to deduction at the establishment of justice and civil peace. Chapters i. and ii. of De Cive, and xiii. and xiv. of Part I. of Leviathan, form one of the finest pieces of reasoning in existence, and an admirable example of the deductive method of logic in vogue during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. I am sorry to have to detach separate passages from the context, but I am compelled to do so in order to enable the reader at a glance to judge of the claims of Hobbes.

From the equality of ability, says Hobbes, arises equality of hope in the attaining of our ends. And, therefore, if any two men desire the same thing, which, nevertheless, they cannot both enjoy, they become enemies. So that in the nature of men we find three causes of quarrel—first, competition; secondly, diffidence of one another; thirdly, glory, i.e. every man looketh that his companion should value him at the same rate he sets upon himself. The first maketh men invade for gain; the second for safety; the third for reputation. Hereby it is manifest that every man is in perpetual war against every man—force and fraud being in war the two cardinal virtues. To this war of every man against every man this also is consequent, that nothing can be unjust. Every man is in continual fear and danger of violent death; and the life of man is solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short. The savage, having no government at all, lives in that brutish manner.

After having conducted us from theorem to theorem to this terrible consequence of the struggle for life, resulting from men's equality, Hobbes, with a no less inflexible logic, leads us to civil peace.

Nature giving to every man, says he, the right of doing what he thinks best for his own preservation, and men in war having a right to everything, even to one another's bodies, there can be no security to any man, how strong or wise soever he be; so every man is compelled to seek peace and use all helps and advantages of war. But in order to endeavour peace, he must lay down this right to all things, and be contented with so much liberty against other men as he would allow other men against himself; for men, being equal, will not enter into conditions of peace, but upon equal terms. So, to obtain peace, man limits his own liberty to all things, and passeth away his right; he transfers it to other men, who do the same by him. The mutual transferring of right is that which men call contract. When the covenant is made, not only is peace obtained, but mine and thine are introduced, and then justice makes its appearance. Because, as Locke says:

"Where there is no property there is no injustice is a proposition as certain as any demonstration in Euclid; for the idea of property being a right to anything, and the idea to which the name injustice is given being the invasion or violation of that right."—(Essay on the Human Understanding, Book IV., chap. iii., sect. 18).

A century after the publication of the Leviathan, Giambattista Vico, so justly called "the father of the philosophy of history," developed in his Principi di Scienza Nuova the same propositions as Hobbes:

"La legislazione considera l'uomo qual è, per farne buoni usi nell'umana società, come della ferocia dell'avarizia, dell'ambizione che sono li tre vizi che portano a traverso tutto il gener umano; ne fa la milizia, la mescolanza et la corte; e al la fortezza, l'opulenza e la sapienza delle Repubbliche; e di questi tre grandi vizi, i quali certamente distruggerebbero l'umana generazione sopra la terra, ne fa la civile felicità."—(Degli Elementi, § 7, ed. di Ferrari, Milano, 1836.)

Hobbes had too great an influence in the formation of modern ideas for us to believe that Vico was ignorant of his works. Of all the modern philosophical historians he is the one who best understood Hobbes; and to understand a man as Vico understood Hobbes is to equal him.

The Critical Philosophy of Immanuel Kant.

By Edward Caird. In 2 vols. (Glasgow: MacLehose.)

At last we have in English a critical exposition of the Critical Philosophy of Kant which, for thoroughness and ability, can hold up its head before any similar attempt in other languages. Twelve years ago Prof. Caird gave to the world an account of the Kritik of Pure Reason, which occasioned more than one controversy. The present work, which in length is more than twice the earlier book, is the result of reflections during these years on the difficulties thus suggested, and covers the whole ground of Kant's "critical" investigation into the principles of science, morals, law, art, and religion.

The outsider in philosophy may perhaps wonder at the present profusion of study on Kant, and some of the more ardent students of philosophy themselves may be heard suggesting that original work is more urgently needed than historical criticism. There is much truth in this. Yet the Critical Philosophy is a fortress at once too important and too doubtful to be safely left unattended to in the rear. Kant blocks the way. The cry to "return to Kant" was raised at first by those who, distasteful with more recent philosophical developments, pointed to him as a bulwark alike against the assaults of materialism and the extravagances of the high a priori road. Unfortunately for these advisers, a closer examination of the ideal standard they set up showed that it was not so perfect as had been assumed. Real or alleged inconsistencies were pointed out in the several canonical books constituting the modern philosopher's Bible. Each of the three chief Kritik was by different judges pronounced the key to the whole system. Nor was that all. The first of the three Kritiken had appeared in two editions separated by a six years' interval. Half a century later a division of opinion, never altogether silent, burst out with energetic affirmations of the superior merit of one or other of these editions, and of their decided divergence. Lastly, minute inspection tended to suggest a view that, whichever edition was made authoritative, the first Kritik was far from being a homogeneous whole, and included passages from inconsistent standpoints.

In these and other difficulties philology reveals, to the consequent risk of subordinating the study of philosophy to a question of words and names. Prof. Caird's work is in the way of recalling philology to its position of pioneer and explorer. It may be laid down that all limitation of Kant's philosophy to one book or part of a book is in the first instance an arbitrary and unfair step, characterising the critic rather than expounding his author. The critic should, on the contrary, rise above divisions which to the author seemed insuperable, and detect a unity which, because unintended, did not fall within his ken. In the case of Kant, one may go too far in the way of marking off one period as absolutely the critical period. The critical spirit is not a sudden birth of 1770 or 1781; for from his very beginnings Kant is bent on getting behind the oppositions of doctrine to the presupposition of common truth, and up to the very last his critical spirit is subdued to lapses into dogmatic prejudice. Nor was the critical spirit the creation of Kant. For all modern philosophy had been in its measure criticism; it had sought to be, what Kant called, transcendental—i.e., to discover the original source from which the details and opposition of common beliefs and ideas could find their explanation, and, if need be, correction. Nor did criticism die with Kant. The movements which for the time he held in unity continued to live and spread after him.

It is one merit of the present work that it conceives its task in this comprehensive measure. If Kant is to be understood as an historic phenomenon, he must be studied in the light of his successors no less than of his predecessors. Prof. Caird has naturally little sympathy with the outcry that bids us ignore Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, if we are to give an unvarnished interpretation of Kant. In many ways, no doubt, these thinkers represent a reaction against him; in many more they inherit and propagate his spirit. To follow Kant in solemnly cutting off Fichte from among his disciples is to be in danger of making Kantism a mere incident of history. Perhaps this is a matter for Germans. It is more to the interest of English students—sua si bona norint—that Prof. Caird does not perplex them with parallels to Mr. H. Spencer or polemical references to Mill. A calmer reading of both sides has taught that Kant is in one way too far removed from Mill to be usefully compared with him, while in principle there often prevails between them a remarkable harmony. Even more important for the historical point of view is it that the reference of Kant's work to Hume has been toned down to due proportion. The shock to dogmatic slumber, about which so much has been written, came more from the spirit, so to say, than from the letter of Hume. Kant's problems, as he felt, touched and crossed those of Hume; but they were by no means the same, and the answer he gave to his own questionings would need a good deal of readjustment before it could be set forth as a reply to Hume's sceptical doubts. In these matters the historian of to-day has, far better than Kant had, the data in his own hand. He need not accept as a revelation impressions proceeding, as many of Kant's historical appreciations did, from very indirect acquaintance with earlier philosophers.

But if the outsider ask, "What precisely in plain language is Kant's value for the problems of modern thought?" he will hardly find the answer he wants from these two volumes. Attempts to sum up in a succinct popular statement the net result of Kant's lucubrations generally issue in a colourless paraphrase of the agnostic creed. At any rate, no such formulae as may be glibly retailed over an examination table need be sought here. If Kant is to be of real use, the student must be content for a while to think in his language, to don the philosophical wig of the period, to move about in the intellectual dress of the age of the great Frederick. We must walk warily among the antiquated forms of last century's thought, and be prepared for sober and often tedious work before we can master its value. Hence the very thoroughness of Prof. Caird's researches and discussions will keep them closed to any but a scholarly and patient reader. Every page of the book bears witness to the author's metaphysical acumen, his penetrating observation, the massive resources of his philosophical knowledge. But there are few of those brilliant and striking passages which arrest the reader, and invite him to feel at home. Chapter after chapter rolls him on from deep to deep, and very rarely indeed does an individual image or illustration break in upon the gray uniformity of general terms and on a stern simplicity worthy of Kant himself. There are, it is true, halting-points, at which a general outlook appears to be vouchsafed. But if the reader imagines that now the prospect will show itself freed from the confusions of detail, he will soon find his mistake. Prof. Caird never assumes the post of showman or cicerone to his hero. Rather he identifies himself with Kant, endeavours to think Kant's positions and steps over again, but to think them out more completely in the light of subsequent history and a maturer reflection. And he expects his readers to follow with their own exertions in his track. If he teaches, they must learn, and not merely open their mouths to bolt the morsels of intellectual food.

One conclusion will, perhaps, impress itself even on those who fail to grasp every word. And that is that the Kant whom they feel around and beside them, even when they barely discern his form, is not exactly what the legends of their speculative infancy had led them to expect. The old mysteries of transcendental ego, synthetic unity, categorical imperative, a priori, and intuition, though they still trouble the untutored mind, have lost their terrors and also their vague promises. Kant can no longer be to us, like some strange white man among barbarians, either a wondrous deity of life or a demon of evil. He sinks down or rises up into more reasonable proportions. If he still has a Cant of his own (to revive the old play of words), he serves to clear away another Cant adhering to our insular modes of thought. His value lies in that criticism which he seems so superfluously to arrogate as his speciality. And that is found, not in isolated parts of his work, which are liable to dogmatism and which do not escape the risks of self-contradiction, nor even in the tout ensemble as a system of dogma; but in what Prof. Caird calls the "transcendental regress," the up-lifting of all questions into a region where opposing schools may recognise a certain reasonableness in each other—a region not of compromise by surrender of equated eccentricities, but of fuller lucidity, where controversy loses its blindness, and therefore its vehemence and inutility. But the pathway of criticism is not the highway of science; and it need excite no surprise that even Kant himself is unable to maintain his unsteady position on the ridge-way of knowledge. "At each step in Kant's work there is the possibility of a twofold interpretation of it" (ii. 153). In other words, the prepossessions of dogmatism are at every step overcoming and obscuring the single-minded spirit of criticism.

"The error of the ordinary view of things," says Prof. Caird (vol. i., p. 193),

"is seen to lie in this, that it takes the object as a thing in itself apart from, and unrelated to, intelligence. It is this error, the error of what we may call a natural abstraction, which gives rise to all the difficulties and antinomies previously spoken of [i.e., the contradictions between the world as perceived by sense and as conceived by intellect], for they all originate in the attempt to treat as a res completa what is not really a res completa. In order, therefore, to solve these antinomies, what we require is, first of all, to recognise the abstraction which such an attempt involves. What we at first take for the thing in itself is a phenomenon or existence for another—i.e., for the self; and, on the other hand, when we have recognised it to be a phenomenon or existence for another, we have begun to apprehend it as a noumenon—i.e., as what it really is in itself. The recognition that consciousness is a necessary element in all that is for it, and that existence is essentially existence-for-a-self, is at once the discovery that the object of knowledge is phenomenal, and it is the discovery of the noumenon of which it is phenomenal. For to recognise that all existence is existence for a self is to adopt a principle the natural outcome or complement of which is the doctrine that all existence is the manifestation of a self. This is in a sense to invert the use of the conception of noumenon and phenomenon, which we find in Kant; but it will be one of the objects of this book to show that it is in this inversion that we discover the essential meaning of Kant's work."

It would be easy to give a superficial censure of such an attitude. It is painful, so it might be said, to see the aged Kant led up again and again to take a final step which he resolutely declines to make; asked to put himself firmly in the standpoint which he admits thought forces us to assume; compelled to accept that enthusiasm (Schwärmerei) and mysticism against which he always turns his mild appealing "as if." But, if the true lesson of history is in its development, Prof. Caird is right in holding that "the Kantian conception of Nature as that which exists for spirit will lead us directly to the Hegelian view that it exists only as the manifestation of spirit" (ii. 90). "The ultimate aim of criticism is to settle the possibility of an idealistic interpretation of the universe" (i. 44); to justify "idealism, in the sense that every intelligence contains in it the form of the universe, and that, therefore, all knowledge is but the discovery of that which is already our own, the awaking of a self-consciousness which involves at the same time a consciousness of God" (ii. 128). Such an attitude implies at every step a modification of the Kantian formulae. Thus, the ideality of space and time must be taken to mean that "they have no reality except as elements in the life of a conscious being, which cannot return to itself except as it opposes itself to an objective world in space and time" (ii. 93). The "transcendental regress" does not carry us behind experience to a something anterior. It always remains within the bounds of consciousness, and never gets back to a mere given something; and the drift of the entire argument is to show that "we are guided in the whole process of experience by the idea of an object to the complete determination of which we are continually approximating," that the thought of a totality, "within which experience grows," is the presupposition of all our efforts to determine objects of knowledge. This point of view similarly shows us that the "categories" and "principles of understanding" are only stages bringing out by degrees more clearly that the unity of the object with itself as a perceptive object ultimately involves its unity with all other objects, and with the mind that knows it. It shows us that, instead of sense, understanding, and reason being in juxtaposition, the very possibility of what is called sense-perception refers us to understanding, and that again hands us on to reason; and it shows that the beginning of the Kritik of Pure Reason is rightly interpreted only when the criticism of Practical Reason discovers that the principles of experience imply a "rational certitude," a consciousness which limits experience. Thus the highest altitudes of science throw light upon the lowest; nature as a whole requires spirit to explain it; "even matter itself cannot be understood except as an element in a spiritual world"; and the whole inorganic world cannot be adequately conceived without the organic. The ordinary mechanical philosophy of course denies this order, and treats the organic as only a very complex product of accident. But this, argues Prof. Caird, is only a consequence of our being enthralled in a practical materialism. "The organic cannot be regarded as that which is least accessible to our intelligence. Rather we must look upon it as that which is most intelligible, and ultimately as that which alone is intelligible" (ii. 535).

Such is the general conclusion which, gathered from the conjunction of the first Kritik with that of the "Teleological Judgment," is worked out through a multitude of intricate discussions of the relations between sense and thought, between imagination and understanding, between objective science and psychology (sensu strictiore), and between the theoretical and the practical reason, the reflective and the determinative judgment. This metaphysical discussion occupies the larger portion of the work. But to most readers, perhaps, the chapters on the philosophy of morals and religion in the second volume may prove most interesting, as they are the easiest to follow. In this part of the work we miss an account, corresponding to that in vol. i. for the logic, of the "pre-critical" period of Kant's ethical history. Yet in more than one point Kant's characteristic standpoint emerges in the writings of 1762-66. His essay on the Evidenz of moral and theological principles shows that he did not suppose that from the general formula of morals the particular and "material" rules could be logically "deduced"—a point of some importance in reference to his later ethical theory. The notice of his lectures in 1765 hints his dependence on Rousseau, and the contrast between two natures in man. And, lastly, the "Observations" of 1764—a treatise which Prof. Caird does not seem even to mention—present the contrast between the solemnity of true virtue founded on principle and the pseudo-virtues of amiability, or sense of honour, and emphasise the "beauty and dignity of human nature" in a way that, even where it differs, serves to bring out his later standpoint.

In his criticism on the Kantian ethics, Prof. Caird tends, as we might expect, to show how the Moralität which is the predominant word in them must ultimately carry us on, if it is to be what it professes, to the Hegelian Sittlichkeit. Yet, without infringing on this criticism, it might have been well perhaps to notice even more than has been done the essential dependence of the highest human life on reflection and reason, and to point out how the whole tone, especially of the Foundation of the Metaphysics of Ethics, rings with the audacity of the Revolutionary epoch. The reader of Kant cannot too much remember that the ethical formula, "Do thy duty," with which that essay begins is transmuted into the other, "Be autonomous," and uphold thy freedom: that the moral Sollen is eigenes nothwendiges Wollen. And, like the Revolution, the Kantian formula had the fault of putting fraternity second to liberty and equality. Yet perhaps this is only to say that it remained within the "moral" strictly so called, and held that, so far as things both indispensable may be put in order of importance, justice and self-realisation must take the pas of benevolence and the love of humanity which is also the love of God. Prof. Caird has well expressed the truth and error of "altruism" in the following passage (ii. 402):

"The true moral self-surrender is not simply the surrender of one self to another, but of all to the universal principle which, working in society, gives back to each his own individual life transformed into an organ of itself. What gives its moral value to the social life, is that it not merely limits the self-seeking of each in reference to the self-seeking of the rest, nor even that it involves a reciprocal sacrifice of each to the others; but that a higher spirit takes possession of each and all, and makes them its organs, turning the natural tendencies and powers of each of the members of the society into the means of realising some special function necessary to the organic completeness of its life. A social relation, say the relation of husband and wife, would be an unsanctified unity of repellent atoms through desires which turn them into external means of each other's life, if those who participate in it were not, by the fact of their union, brought into the conscious presence of something higher than their individuality. In fact, in this most direct union of individuals, nature generally takes care of this, by awaking affections which make the interests of the children (who represent the continued unity of the family) predominant over the separate interests of the heads of the family. Hence, we need not wonder that the first worship of men concentrated round the family sacra, and that the desire to keep up the continuity of these sacra, as a worship of the family god, became the great determining ideal influence of early morality. The surrender of the individual as a natural being, and his recovery of his life as an organ dedicated to a special social function, is the essential dialectic of morals, which repeats itself in every form of society. It is the 'logic of facts' which redeems man's life from egoism by giving him a higher alter ego, which yet is not the ego of another individual as such."

The same theme returns in Kant's rational religion. Here, too, Kant jealously guards the rights of personality, and shrinks from the bondage of a visible church. The only church he cares to recognise is an invisible one—the church of rational beings, whose union consists only in the essential identity of all rational aims. The ideal and the real stand wide asunder: the world and the flesh, instead of being transformed into the links of a unity higher than themselves, are treated only as drawbacks and hindrances to that perfect unity of perfectly reasonable souls, each moving in orbits of its own, but all working harmoniously. Kant remained at the standpoint of the Stoic—the "righteousness of the law." "Only a revised social consciousness which carries us beyond this isolating attitude," concludes Prof. Caird (ii. 624),

"can bring moral deliverance: and he who will not take upon him the burden of the evil of others, and even accept it also as if it were his own guilt, can never get rid of his own. . . . He for whom all evil and sorrow is his own has conquered sin and sorrow,—this was the secret of Jesus Christ as it was read by St. Paul. It is a secret which might seem to be the grave of all morality, as it seems to be the negation of individual responsibility: and it might really be so, if it were not taken as the deeper truth to which morality points, and which, therefore, presupposes the moral consciousness, while it goes beyond it."

Thus much to call attention to a very remarkable book, fairly to discuss which is impossible within the brief limits of such an article.

SCIENCE NOTES.

MR. A. C. SEWARD, of St. John's College, has been appointed a university lecturer in botany at Cambridge.

THE Easter excursion of the Geologists' Association, from April 3 to 8, will be to North Staffordshire, under the general direction of Dr. Whealton Hind, of Stoke-on-Trent.

In a few days the first part of a new work on the Theory of Determinants, by Dr. Thomas Muir, of Glasgow, will be published by Messrs.

Macmillan & Co. In continuation of his former treatise on the same subject (1882), it presents the theory in the historical order of its development, being largely based upon a bibliography published by the author in two volumes of the Quarterly Journal of Mathematics. It begins with the brilliant but unfruitful conceptions of Leibnitz in 1693, and carries the record forward to 1841, the year of the appearance of Prof. Cayley's first paper.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, the name of M. Clermont-Ganneau was recommended "en première ligne" for the chair of Semitic epigraphy and antiquities at the Collège de France.

MESSRS. BRILL, of Leiden, announce the publication of a new review, entitled T'oung-pao, to deal with the history, languages, geography, and ethnography of the Further East. The editors are Prof. G. Schlegel and M. Henri Cordier, and papers may be written in either French, English, or German.

THE last number of Trübner's Record is an exceptionally interesting one. Besides further summaries of papers read at the recent Oriental Congress, it contains several original articles:—A Siamese version of "The House that Jack Built," by Dr. Frankfurter, with a Hebrew parallel; an account of lexicographical work at Cairo, by Dr. Vollers; a Buddhist Jataka, translated from the Burmese by Mr. R. F. St. A. St. John; a letter from Bishop Biet to Mr. Rookstro, about exploration in Tibet; a reprint from the Pioneer of an article on the new Gupta inscription found at Bithari; and another from the Münchener Neueste Nachrichten of a summary of Dr. F. Hirth's Sinological researches. The two principal reviews are of Grierson's "The Modern Vernacular Literature of Hindustan," and Winckler's "Researches in the Ancient History of the East," by Dr. C. Bezold. The obituaries, as usual, are a special feature. That of Sir H. Yule is reprinted from the Times, with a list of contributions to the transactions of learned societies; that of Ahlqvist is by Dr. J. N. Reuter; and then follows notices of three German Arabists—Thorbecke, Kremer, and Weil.

The March number of the Classical Review (David Nutt) opens with an essay on "A Future Life as Represented by the Greek Tragedians," by Miss Maud M. Daniel. The most important reviews are those of Rutherford's "Thucydides," by Prof. Tyrrell; Bury's "History of the Later Roman Empire," by Dr. T. Hodgkin; Hardy's "Correspondence between Pliny and Trajan," by Prof. Mayor; and Tucker's "Supplies," by Mr. A. E. Housman.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

ELIZABETHAN SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, March 5.)
FREDERICK ROGERS, Esq., in the chair.—A paper sent by Mr. John Addington Symonds on "The Songs of the Elizabethan Dramatists, or the Lyricism of the English Romantic Drama," was read. Mr. Symonds drew particular attention to the fact that the most prominent feature of the Elizabethan drama is a predominance of high-strung poetry in all its parts; and that the playwright, in his diction, in his images and metaphors, in his rhetorical embroidery, in his handling of blank verse, exhibits a poetical faculty which sometimes conceals the poverty of his dramatic resources. The tone of diction proper to dramatic utterance frequently exhales in lyrics. These "lyrical interbreathings," as Coleridge called them, with admirable nicety of phrase, are exquisitely beautiful. To the student in his chamber they offer new delights at the turning of every page. They appeal to his imagination, they stimulate his sense of beauty and of passion in the outer and the inner worlds of nature and mankind. But they tend to clog and interrupt the movement of the drama. It is the function of the drama in all ages to reflect the very form and presence of the time in which it flourishes. The material conditions of the English theatre were favourable to the development of a lyrical element in our drama. In the absence of scenery and stage decorations, appeal had to be made to the imagination of the spectators. That was done by raising the accent of poetic speech to such a pitch that the wildest flights of fancy emphasised the playwright's meaning. Mr. Symonds showed by copious illustrations that the uplifting of dramatic into lyrical style in dialogue and soliloquy is common to all those of the Elizabethan playwrights who were gifted with a genuine poetic faculty. Some of the dramatists, however, were defective in the lyrical faculty. Their blank verse lyricism is rather rhetorical than poetical, and their songs are mediocre. Massinger is of this sort; so, but in a less degree, is Middleton; and Shirley might be classed with them had he not bequeathed to us the two immortal odes upon the vanity of human power and glory, from "Cupid and Death," and "The Contention of Ajax." Mr. Symonds alluded to the two collections of dramatic lyrics that have been published in this century—Mr. Robert Bell's Songs from the Dramatists, and Mr. A. H. Bullen's Lyrics from Elizabethan Dramatists; and expressed the hope that, when Mr. Bullen issues a new edition of his book, he will incorporate the songs of playwrights before Lyly, adding, perhaps, the fresh and simple April song which opens the morality of "Lusty Juventus." An interesting discussion followed, which was opened by the chairman, and continued by Mr. F. Payne, Mr. W. H. Cowham, Mr. W. Thompson, Mr. J. E. Baker, and other members of the society.

ROYAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE. — (Thursday, March 6.)

EARL PERCY, president, in the chair.—Mr. J. Park Harrison communicated the first part of a paper on "Anglo-Norman Ornament compared with Designs in Anglo-Saxon MSS." He drew attention to the architectural details of the Saxon period as illustrated by many of the early MSS. From these he concluded that the architecture of the Saxon era was of a far superior character than was generally admitted.—Mr. A. Oliver read a paper on "The Roger Thoroton Brass at Newcastle-upon-Tyne." Earl Percy exhibited a silver ornament shaped like a crescent. It had been found about twelve months ago at Newham, Northumberland. It was suggested that it might have been used as a badge for some retainer of the Percy family.

FINE ART.

LETTER FROM EGYPT.

Sht: March 12, 1890.

ONE of the attractions presented by Luxor to the archaeologist is the collection of Egyptian antiquities formed by the Rev. C. Murch, of the American Mission. His residence there at a season of the year when tourists are absent has offered him opportunities of which his discriminating knowledge has not been slow to avail itself. His collection of scarabs is one of the finest in the world, and the numerous royal names it contains makes it particularly interesting. Among them is the name of "Ahmes, the chief wife of the king" and what Mr. Petrie reads as "prince of the mountains, Khian." Many of them record the names of private persons, more especially of the "feudal chiefs" who lived under the XIIth and XIIIth Dynasties. There are also three scarabs of the age of the XIIIth Dynasty, which belonged to certain "captains of the king's thirty"—a title which we found among the graffiti on the rocks north of Silsilis. Mr. Murch also possesses one of the large "hunting scarabs" of Amenophis III., describing the number of lions slain by the king in his tenth year, as well as numerous rings of blue and green porcelain inscribed with the cartouches of the monarchs of the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties. Mr. Murch's collection is particularly rich in small objects bearing the name of Khu-n-Aten, which have probably come from the tomb of "the Heretic King," about which I have already written to the ACADEMY. He has also a terra-cotta stopper of a vase from Tel-el-Amarna, which gives us the hitherto unknown cartouche of one of Khu-n-Aten's immediate successors, and seems to read "Toui-naz-n-hib-m-Aten-mes-Aten." Mr. Wilbour has a similar stopper with the same cartouche. Another unknown cartouche is found on a large blue porcelain stamp, but the period to which it belongs is late. The gem of the collection is a large cylinder of creamy semi-opaque glass, which forms the outer coating of a cylinder of porcelain, and on which are incised the name and titles of Nofer-ka-ra. As the titles show that this must be the Nofer-ka-ra of the VIth Dynasty, we may see in the cylinder the oldest piece of dated glass in the world. Among other noteworthy things in the collection may be mentioned glass beads of the most variegated and beautiful patterns—some of which are as early as the time of the XVIIIth Dynasty—small objects of gold (one of them representing a human figure with a serpent's head), a large stone heart with a human face inscribed with a chapter from the Book of the Dead, and several strange figures of the god Bes of the Roman epoch. One, for example, of blue porcelain represents the god on the top of the uaz sceptre, with Horus in one hand, an apple in the other, and a monkey below. Another places him on the back of two crocodiles, with Horus standing behind, and Isis on either side. I must not forget to add that Mr. Murch possesses two chevron beads of enormous size—one no less than six inches in circumference, of the class about which Miss Buckland raised a discussion before the Anthropological Section of the British Association at Bath. My companion, Mr. Robertson, bought a bead of the same kind at Qeneh, which had been found in a tomb at Denderah, and is, therefore, presumably of the Graeco-Roman age.

When at Ekhmim I was enabled, through the kindness of M. Frénay, to carry out a long-projected excursion to the Wadi Shêkh Shebûn, some miles to the south-east of the town. The Wâdi is mentioned by Pococke, who describes it as containing a natural spring of water and a few Coptic chapels, and was rediscovered by Prof. Maspero. Its length and ruggedness, the height of the precipices which rise up sheer on either side, the cascades of stone over which the water has once made its way, and the unexpected verdure which springs up like an oasis where the water still gushes forth from the rock, combine to render the scenery not only unique in Egypt, but hardly to be matched elsewhere in the world. About a mile from the entrance of the gorge is a huge boulder covered with the names of travellers. The inscriptions are mostly Coptic, but one is in Nabathæan characters, and is dated in the third year of Malchas; while there are some curious Greek texts which inform us of the existence of a club of huntsmen at Panopolis or Ekhmim. At the head of the club was an ἀρχικύννης, or "chief huntsman"; and its members were called θηροφυλακτικοὶ καὶ κυνηγοὶ ἐπὶ τῇ θέρῃ. A little to the south of the entrance of the Wâdi have been found the small tablets of wood which bear Greek and demotic mortuary inscriptions.

South of the Gebel Shêkh Heridi, where the cliffs are known as Gebelên, I discovered some quarries with some curious representations in black paint of scenes from the Iliad. The warriors are in Greek costume, and are accompanied by demotic inscriptions, too much injured, however, for one who is unacquainted with demotic to attempt to copy them. By the side of the Homeric pictures are representations of the god Min, of Horus, and other purely Egyptian figures, though the delineation shows that the artist must have been the same in each case. On the rocks above the well-known quarries of the Gebel Shêkh Heridi itself my companion and I found the cartouches of Apries, which do not seem to have been noticed before; and near the northern extremity of the cliffs, a little to the right of some large quarries, he discovered the cartouches and titles of Ramses III. carved on the face of the cliff. Between the cartouches the king is standing bareheaded, with the solar orb and the symbols of life above him. His hands are held by Horus on the right and Amon-Ra on the left, and the symbol of life is held towards his face by the two gods. The whole tableau is twenty feet in height and forty feet eight inches in length, the figure of the king being sixteen feet high, while the cartouches at the side are each twelve feet high and four-and-a-quarter feet broad. The sculpture is similar to that near the ancient necropolis of Nineveh, discovered by myself some years ago, and afterwards described by Mr. Oliphant. It is evident that the quarries were worked by Ramses III., and we may, perhaps, infer that he built in the neighbouring city of Antaeopolis.

Prof. Maspero asked me to examine the tombs in the Gabel Selin (or Sala-eddin) on the eastern bank of the river, about fifteen miles south of Sift, which were reputed to belong to the age of the Vth and VIth Dynasties. I have spent a long day among them, carefully examining the cliffs from behind Dêr el-Tasseh, northward to El-Khowâleh (called El-Khowâbid in Murray's Handbook). There are many ancient quarries in the cliffs, most of which are being blasted away by modern quarrymen, and an immense number of tombs. None of the tombs which are accessible, however, contain any vestige of inscription or ornament, save only a solitary Greek graffito; and there is absolutely nothing about them to indicate their age. But besides the tombs which are accessible there is a large number which are inaccessible. These are cut high up on the cliff, which has weathered away below them; so that for untold centuries they must have remained unapproached by man. They may be among the oldest tombs now existing in Egypt. Most of them are provided with a small square window; in some cases there is a window cut in the rock on either side of the entrance. Unlike the tombs below them, they show no traces of any attempt to represent the posts or lintel of a door. The only place in which I found any inscriptions were in some large quarries behind El-Khowâleh, where I came across a good many demotic inscriptions in red paint, the figure of a Greek mercenary brandishing a sword, and the façade of a temple. The Copts had turned one of the quarries into a church, and had covered the walls with paintings and texts. About a quarter of a mile to the south of the quarries an enormous altar has been cut out of the rock; on the top of it are two hollow basins, and a path has been excavated round it.

I believe that in my last letter I forgot to say that we discovered the site of the ancient necropolis of Kom Ombos when on our way from Assuan to Luxor. The present village of Shoth, south-east of the ruined temple, stands on a portion of it. The diggers of Qurnah have already been busy there; from one of the tombs they have opened Mr. Wilbour extracted the fragments of a mummy-case of the Greek period. The character of the necropolis resembles that of Tel es-Semaneh (or rather Kom Mehra). Both alike consist of vaulted tombs of crude brick slightly sunk in a plateau of loose soil, which rises just above the level of the cultivated land.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. HAYNES-WILLIAMS has ready for the summer exhibitions two attractive pictures, while a third is in progress. Of the two already finished, the most important will be called "The Last Dance." The scene is laid at the beginning of the present century, and the composition is of three figures. The place, a ball-room, or a withdrawing-room, just apart from it; the hour, early morning; the persons, two youthful and graceful men and a pretty young woman, all of them of the best society, and in a world of easy luxury. A tête-à-tête between the young woman and one of the young men is interrupted courteously and of necessity by the arrival of the second admirer, to claim the girl for the final dance. The gentle unwillingness of the two seated figures to be separated is indicated with a reserved but not the less real dramatic power, and an element of light and pleasant comedy pertains to the scene. Technically, the work is very strong, Mr. Haynes-Williams's facile mastery in the treatment of a luxurious interior never having been better displayed—not even in the Fontainebleau series. The second picture of the artist is an attractive fancy portrait—a fresh and warmly-coloured young blonde lady in very simple evening dress. The subject has much character.

MR. ROSCOE MULLINS, having discharged himself of a commission for the Duke of Marlborough—two seated figures, typical of Music and Poetry, destined to be carved in wood hereafter, as the chief decoration of a great new organ at Blenheim—has ready for the exhibitions: first, the bust of a lady in marble; secondly, in clay, a little composition of great gladness—a seated boy with legs wide apart, and engaged upon a performance on the Jew's-harp (this is called "The Muse's Younger Brother"); and, thirdly, likewise in terra-cotta, a nearly nude standing figure of a young girl to be known as "The Betrothed." Mr. Mullins has never been more happily inspired than in this essentially poetic and graceful piece of work, while "The Muse's Younger Brother" attests again his talent in endowing a single figure with the vivacity of comedy.

THE Exhibitions to open next week are—the Royal Society of British Artists, in Suffolk Street; the New English Art Club, who have this year taken galleries so far West as Knightsbridge; and the Continental Gallery, New Bond Street.

MESSRS. DEPREZ & GUTENKUNST have this week had on view an important selection from a great collection of French prints to be sold next month in Paris. The Parisian collector sets possibly more store than ever upon the national school of engraving as it was developed or perfected in the eighteenth century, and we should be inclined to take exception to his judgment only when it displays itself in a preference for the coloured print over the black and white of the more legitimate engraver. It was not by colour that the art of the greater masters was recorded and multiplied by their interpreters; yet the coloured prints after Tannay and Regnault at the latter part of the eighteenth century are worth even greater sums just now in the market than are needed as the ransoms of the finest Watteaus, the nobler and more sedate Chardins, the dainty Lavreances and St. Aubins, and the vehement Fragonards. One dainty Lavreance, by Vidal—that does happen to be coloured—we allow great charm to. It is "Le Déjeuner Anglais"; while the pair of Regnault's workmanship, known as "Le Lever" and "Le Bain"—one of them actually designed by Regnault himself, and the other designed by Baudouin—are certainly the dernier mot of the purely seductive. Again, such portraits of Louis Seize and Marie Antoinette as stand side by side in the rare print which, as some of our readers may remember, was reproduced in colour in Lord Ronald Gower's Marie Antoinette volume, are certainly enviable; and in the rare impression now to be sold the Boucher-like border, rose colour and pale blue, tells admirably on the satin which has served instead of paper to receive the impression. But generally we hold ourselves justified in preferring the more virile art of the engravings in black and white. Not to speak of the Watteaus and Chardins—admitted classics now in every civilised land—where has the design of the painter or the burin of the engraver done better than in "La Chemise enlevée" by Guersant, after Fragonard? The picture is in the Salle Lacaze of the Louvre. Or again, to take work yet larger in style as well as in scale, there is Liotard's portrait of his niece, Mdlle. Lavergne. The pastel, we believe, is at Amsterdam. Then, again, there are the masterpieces of Greuze, the "Orpheus Casqué" and "La Laitière"; and lastly, we must not, while leaving a world of things unmentioned, forget to name "Le Bal Paré" and "Le Concert" of Augustin de St. Aubin. The second of the two is especially memorable for dignity and balance of composition, and for the easy elegance of the assembled company. The time cannot be distant when the English amateur will follow the connoisseurs of France in at least a reasonable estimation of the whole school to which we have been referring.

MR. J. M. GRAY lectured on Saturday last upon "The Life and Works of Andrew Geddes" to the art students of the Royal Scottish Academy and the Trustees Academy, Edinburgh. The address dealt mainly with the work of Geddes in dry-point, work less widely known and appreciated than it deserves to be, owing to the rarity of fine and adequate impressions of his plates—those published a few years ago in the volume of Wilkie and Geddes' Etchings being much worn and deteriorated. The lecturer gave an account of the technical processes of the various methods of engraving; and his remarks were illustrated by Mr. W. G. Burn-Murdoch, who printed, before the audience, examples of etchings and of dry-point plates. The works of art brought together on the occasion—paintings and drawings by Geddes lent by various owners, and Mr. Gray's collection of progressive and other proofs of his etchings and dry-points, and of engravings from his pictures, the latter including the admirable mezzotints by William Ward—remained on view to the public in the place of lecture (one of the halls of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery) during part of the present week.

THE STAGE.

VANBRUGH AT THE VAUDEVILLE.

WHEN the successful practitioner of one art engages in the performance of another, he is apt to think very seriously of his newer love—to hold that it was in the first instance only that he mistook his vocation.

Ingres, after excelling in design and draughtsmanship, fancied himself very much as a performer on the fiddle; and many another instance might be given of the artist's determination to accept himself in the art in which the public has omitted to applaud him. Perhaps it was just because the public did not omit to applaud as a dramatist the great architect who built Blenheim and Castle Howard, that Vanbrugh himself spoke but slightly of his literature. Of one among his plays he protested that it lacked everything except length. Yet for "The Relapse" he was particular to claim at least one quality. He was hurt or surprised if it was suggested that impropriety had any place in it. Only the unduly demure could object to that which he therein set forth. We are to-day, however, too squeamish to receive the food he proffered to the robust. But it is a mistake when, in addition to this infirmity, we add—as Mr. Buchanan seems to add—the implication that Vanbrugh was heartless. Vanbrugh was not heartless at all; nor are the offices of Mr. Buchanan needed to give him what he is supposed to have lacked in this respect. His heart was in the right place; but his method in literature was essentially virile. The young lady in the dress circle was not known in his day. In our day, however, she, or the maturer relative who watches over her interests, is alarmingly influential; and such a piece as "The Relapse" has unquestionably to be treated by the adapter with no tender hand if her admirers are to be conciliated.

The long and short of it is that Mr. Buchanan is quite right in saying that his present piece is "founded on," rather than an adaptation of, Vanbrugh. He has suppressed the main plot of "The Relapse" altogether. We have no Loveless, no Amanda, no Berinthia. The transactions of the first and the last of these are not for our day. It is the underplot that Mr. Buchanan has used; and he has made into a heroine that Miss Hoyden who, in the original piece, does not so much as appear until well on into the third act. Lord Foppington is preserved; but it is upon Miss Hoyden alone that this affected and self-satisfied peer must concentrate his attentions. Tom Fashion, his younger brother, is preserved also; and the tricks by which he manages to win Miss Hoyden form almost the main business of the play. Sir Tunbelly Clumsy remains upon the scene, and one or two other minor people; and Coupler indeed is but thinly disguised as "Sir George Matcham." But, as I have implied, a great deal has of necessity gone; and with the characters there has gone too, of course, the larger part of the dialogue. Yet, if Mr. Buchanan has removed much, he has had to supply the vacancy by inventions of his own. The notion that the real Lord Foppington shall be persuaded he has come into a lunatic asylum, when in reality he has but arrived at the dwelling of Sir Tunbelly Clumsy, is Mr. Buchanan's alone. And that—together with the fact that it has naturally seemed good to him to make Miss Hoyden his heroine—implies or explains how the element of pure high comedy has yielded, on the Vaudeville stage, to the element of farce. It is very good farce—sympathetic farce, if you will—excellently acted farce beyond a doubt. Farce, however, or farcical comedy, it is, just as plainly as the triumphs of Mr. Pinero in this kind—"The Magistrate," "The Schoolmistress," and "Dandy Dick." Only there is not here quite the affluence of invention which distinguishes our greatest living master of the comedy that is farcical.

The success of the performance—which on the afternoon of Thursday in last week was conspicuous—is due chiefly to the brothers Thorne, to Mr. Gillmore, to Mr. Cyril Maude, and, above all, to Miss Winifred Emery. This lady, whose intelligence nobody ever questioned, finds herself in reality more perfectly placed as the hoyden heroine of this version of "The Relapse" than as Clarissa Harlowe. She does much with Clarissa Harlowe—is often delicately true, and always at least realises one's ideal as to the innate refinement and sweetness of Richardson's heroine; but, as I had occasion to say a few weeks ago, she is not exactly great in the scene in which greatness might have won a triumph. Now, as Miss Hoyden, she is more than interesting—she is varied and faultless. Miss Emery's part is the big part in the piece, and she has proved her right to be entrusted with it. Mr. Thomas Thorne plays Lord Foppington with great neatness of touch, and with effective affectations. He is most entertaining in the first act, where the busy emptiness of the wealthy fop is displayed amusingly. The scene here, with the servants and the waiting tradesmen grouped around the infirm beau, goes far to recall the engaging design of "La Petite Toilette," by the younger Moreau. Mr. Fred Thorne gives much and appropriate colour to the part of a rough but tender-hearted squire, Sir Tunbely. Mr. Gillmore, as Tom Fashion, acts with great spirit, and looks—as he always looks in those eighteenth-century clothes which he wears so well—for the life of him like a drawing of Gravelot's. The marked personality of Mr. Cyril Maude and his careful art combine to give importance to the part of Lord Foppington's valet. But Mr. Maude is worthy, I am inclined to imagine, of a part more onerous and intrinsically bigger.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

SIR C. HALLÉ played Beethoven's Concerto in C minor at the Crystal Palace last Saturday afternoon. This event attracted special interest, as was evident from the large attendance. It was the last public performance of the veteran pianist in London previous to his departure for Australia. He gave a pure and refined reading of the Allegro and Largo, and in the Rondo displayed much life and humour. In the opening movement, a clever, if rather old-fashioned, Cadenza, by Moscheles, was introduced. Sir C. Hallé afterwards was heard in some short solos by Schubert and Mendelssohn, adding Schubert's Impromptu in F minor (Op. 142, No. 4) by way of encore. The programme included Goldmark's Overture "Im Frühling" (Op. 36), which contains melodious themes and bright orchestration. The subject-matter does not strike one as particularly fresh—the influence of Wagner is felt, as, indeed, is the case in most of the composer's works with which we are acquainted—but the music is clever and genial. Mozart's "Linz"

Symphony in C, and Dr. Mackenzie's Orchestral Ballad, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," were the other instrumental pieces. Miss Liza Lehmann was the vocalist.

M. de Greef, the Belgian pianist, who played for the first time in London at the Saturday Afternoon Popular Concert, made his second appearance on the following Monday evening. From his rendering of St. Saëns's Caprice on some of the ballet airs from Gluck's Alceste, it became at once evident that he has wonderful command of the keyboard. The showy music was given with all possible brilliancy and decision. This unclassical piece was followed by Chopin's B flat minor Scherzo (Op. 31), but there was something angular and exaggerated about the performance. For an encore the pianist gave Chopin's D flat Waltz. He afterwards joined Dr. Joachim in Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 30, No. 3) for piano and violin, and his part was interpreted in an unostentatious and refined manner. We shall be curious to hear M. de Greef in one of Beethoven's great pianoforte Sonatas; it is only by such means that one can judge him properly. Dr. Joachim played Spohr's Barcarolle and Scherzo with his usual success. Mr. Thorndike sang with fervour and artistic skill songs by Cellier, Somervell, and Maddison. The concert opened with a magnificent performance of Beethoven's Quartet in E minor, under the leadership of Dr. Joachim.

Miss Agnes Zimmermann gave a pianoforte recital at Prince's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. She opened with Beethoven's early Sonata in C (Op. 2, No. 3). In the Adagio her tone was somewhat cold; but the Allegro finale was played with great neatness and vivacity. A group of short solos included two interesting movements from a Bach Sonata, a quaint and attractive Arietta by Leonardo Leo the famous Neapolitan composer, and the somewhat hackneyed Rameau Gavotte and Variations. Miss Zimmermann played the first two admirably. The most difficult task of the afternoon was the Chopin Sonata in B flat minor. In the first movement the lady displayed unusual warmth and energy. The Finale, too, was given at great speed and without slip. The middle movements pleased us less; but, on the whole, Miss Zimmermann deserves great praise for her rendering of this perilous piece. The programme concluded with solos by Liszt, Rubinstein, and other modern composers. The concert was well attended.

Mr. Stephen Kemp gave a chamber concert at Prince's Hall on Wednesday evening, at which was produced an MS. Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin, by the late Sir G. A. Macfarren, interpreted by Mlle. Vaillant and the concert-giver. The work is full of tuneful, if not strikingly original, melody, and is well laid out for both instruments. The last of the three movements has most character. Mr. Kemp's programme included Dvorak's pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 21), songs, and instrumental solos.

On the same evening Mr. J. Barnby conducted a performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt" at the Royal Albert Hall. The opportunities of hearing this great work are few and far between, and hence it attracted an unusually large audience. The performance was, on the whole, a remarkably fine one. Mr. Barnby's tenors and basses are heard to advantage in "The Lord is a man of war," but we wonder how many of them knew that the composer's intentions were utterly disregarded, as it is a duet, and not a chorus. And why could not Mr. Barnby, who is at times so firm, resist the undramatic demand for an encore of the "Hailstone" chorus? The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Brereton, Mme. Patey, and Mr. Iver McKay, who were all in good voice.

THE LATE PROFESSOR DELITZSCH.

NOW COMPLETE.

In 3 vols. crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d. each.

A BIBLICAL COMMENTARY ON THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

By FRANZ DELITZSCH, D.D., of Leipzig.

Translated by the Rev. DAVID EATON, M.A., from the Latest Edition, specially revised by the Author.

Academy.—"The English Reader has probably the best existing commentary on the Psalms in a perfectly reliable form."

Saturday Review.—"Students of the Book of Psalms will welcome a new edition of Prof. Delitzsch's Commentary which includes the most recent learning on the subject without any increase of size. Hebrew scholars especially will find the critical and historical examination of the several Psalms full of the best kind of information."

CHURCH HISTORY.

By Professor KURTZ.

Authorised Translation from the latest Revised Edition.

By the Rev. JOHN MACPHERSON, M.A.

Spectator.—"Kurtz's Manual of Church History, which Mr. Macpherson has translated with admirable care and skill, is the one book of the kind adapted for present use. It is not meant for the general reader who needs to be interested, but for the student who desires information, and is glad to have it in the most compressed form, and he who goes to it with this aim will not be disappointed."

Scotsman.—"The complete work of Professor Kurtz is now translated, and it really shows itself so improved in form, so much fuller in substance, in fact, so much changed in mind, body, and state, that it may claim to be a new history altogether."

Now ready, price 1s.

THE UNKNOWN GOD; Or, INSPIRATION AMONG PRE-CHRISTIAN RACES.

By C. LORING BRACE.

Church Belle.—"A most valuable and remarkable book."

British Weekly.—"Such a book as Mr. Brace has given us is most welcome, and if those who most need it would only read it and ponder it, much enlightenment would result. We speak of pagan darkness, but the darkness of our enlightened century regarding those same pagans is dense and disastrous."

THE MARQUESS of DALHOUSIE.

By SIR WILLIAM WILSON HUNTER, K.S.O.I., O.I.E., M.A., LL.D.
Editor of the Series; Author of "The Annals of Rural Bengal," "The Indian Empire," "The Imperial Gazetteer of India," "A Brief History of the Indian People," &c.

The distinctive plan of the series is to present to English readers the salient outlines and turning-points in the evolution of the Indian Empire in a carefully planned sequence of historical retrospects.
Each volume will take a conspicuous epoch in the making of India, and under the name of its principal personage, will set forth the problems of government which confronted him, the work which he achieved, and the influences which he left behind.

The series will be produced under the general supervision of Sir W. W. HUNTER, whose reputation in the fields of Indian History, Statistics, and Administration is well known, and no effort has been spared to secure for each volume the writer best qualified to illustrate the period entrusted to him.
Further Volumes are in active preparation, and will be published shortly.

REMINGTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

SIN of JOOST AVELINGH: a Dutch Story. By MAARTEN MAARTENS. 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s.

Some Press Notices.

The Academy says: "A book by a man of genuine genius. A true artist. A book of singular freshness and power." The Athenæum says: "Unquestionably a good piece of work, with clear delineation, accurate pictures of life, and abundance of local colour." The Standard says: "In scarcely any of the sensational novels of the day will the reader find more nature or more human nature."

THE BLACK BOX MURDER: a Story. By the MAN WHO DISCOVERED THE MURDERER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Athenæum says: "May be recommended to those who like detective stories as a good specimen of the class." The Liverpool Courier says: "Most ingeniously wrought; equal in interest and novelty to the most popular sensational stories."

The right of translation of this story has been bought a few weeks after publication for Engelhorn's well-known "Library of Fiction" in Germany.

W. H. ALLEN & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Fcap. 4to, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 8s. 6d.

THE PASSION PLAY at OBER-AMMERGAU. With the whole Drama translated into English, and the Songs of the Chorus in German and English. Containing a Map of the Neighbourhood, Plan of the Theatre, Hints as to Routes Lodgings, &c. By the AUTHOR of "CHARLES LOWDER."

"The most useful work of the kind yet published..... It contains what has never previously been published—the text of the complete play in English, with the words of the songs in German and English—should be carefully mastered before a visit to the theatre."—Manchester Guardian.

"Will prove most useful to English visitors to Ober-Ammergau."—Scotsman.

Every English visitor should certainly possess this."—Church Times.
 "There are few cultivated readers to whom this volume will not be interesting, and to those who intend to make this year a pilgrimage to Ober-Ammergau to witness one of the most interesting living relics of the Middle Ages it will be simply invaluable."—Manchester Examiner.

New Edition (in 6 vols.) Crown 8vo, 6s. each. Sixth and Last Volume of the HISTORY of the SEPOY WAR and of the INDIAN MUTINY. By Sir John KAYE and Colonel G. B. MALLESON, C.S.I. Revised and Edited by Colonel MALLESON.

The Sixth Volume consists, in great part, of new matter, narrating the occurrences at some of the Principal Stations, other than those originally dealt with, during 1857-58. It also contains a new and comprehensive Index.

"Messrs. W. H. Allen have done a public service by bringing the best attainable narrative of the Indian Mutiny within the reach of a larger number of readers."—Guardian.

"This consolidated edition, in the handy cabinet size, must be welcomed as a boon."—Scotsman.
 "A very readable and handy edition of this standard book."—Broad Arrow.

Crown 8vo, with numerous Maps, Charts, Illustrations of Buoys, Beacons, &c., price 6s.

MEMORIALS of the GOODWIN SANDS and their SURROUNDINGS, LEGENDARY and HISTORICAL, including an ACCOUNT of the HOVELLERS of KENT. By G. BYNG GATTIE.

"A book which, with a little pruning, might be made as free from faults as human work need be."—Saturday Review.

"Might have been called 'All about the Goodwins,' for it is fairly exhaustive, though it is the first book on the subject."—Daily News.

"A strange subject and a fascinating one, as those will discover who read Mr. Gattie's 'Memorials.'"—Echo.

"Brings together more information about its subject than has probably ever been brought within one pair of covers before."—Scotsman.
 "This charming volume is a valuable addition to the library of Kentish books, and will attract far more than local attention as the best account yet written of the famous Goodwins."—Canterbury Press.

New Edition, with Coloured Plate, square 8vo cloth, 5s.

SAKOONTALA; or, the Lost Ring. An Indian Drama. Translated into English Prose and Verse, from the Sanskrit of Kālidāsa. By Sir MONIER MONIER-WILLIAMS.

NEW VOLUME OF A SERIES OF SKETCHES FOR SETTLERS IN THE COLONIES, AMERICA, &c.—Fcap. 8vo, price 2s. 6d. each.

BEYOND the ARGENTINE. Letters from BRAZIL. By May Frances.

"Gives a capital picture of up-country life, and has the great charm of simplicity."—Evening News.

Next Volume, IN FAR DAKOTA. By Mrs. Locke.

[Nearly ready.]

1 vol., crown 8vo, Illustrated with Anatomical Plates, 3s. 6d.

THE PEDESTRIAN'S RECORD. With a Description of the External Human Form. By J. IRVINE LUPTON, F.R.C.V.S., L.A.O., Author of "The External Anatomy of the Horse," and J. M. K. LUPTON, L.A.O.

"A carefully written and compiled handbook..... Will be found eminently interesting to all who engage in athletic pursuits. Its hints on training are well worth the consideration of the athlete..... The Time Records published with this book are most complete, and it is with most cordial feelings that I commend it to amateur athletes."—Globe.

Morning Post.

THE STATESMEN SERIES.

Comprising a Collection of Brief Biographical Studies of the Great Men, Continental as well as English, who have influenced the Political History of the World.

EDITED BY LLOYD C. SANDERS.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. each. Last Volume Issued.

LORD DERBY. By T. E. Kebbel, Author of "Lord Beaconsfield," "History of Toryism," &c.

"The only biography of the great Tory leader in existence..... Mr. Kebbel has contrived to produce a very interesting book..... The chapters on Lord Derby as a sportsman and as a man of letters, and the final one in which he sums up his characteristics and his achievements, and estimates his real position in history are particularly well done."—St. James's Gazette.

"Fully as good as his 'Lord Beaconsfield.' High praise. The estimate of Lord Derby as a statesman and as a literary man is excellent, and the personal anecdotes are amusing."—Athenaeum.

"A skilful condensation of the leading facts in the late Lord Derby's career, and a fair judgment of the statesman's work and influence..... Mr. Kebbel's discriminating little book is well worth reading."—Saturday Review.

"An excellent example of what can be done with a large subject in a small space."—Yorkshire Post.

LETTERS of the Rev. JOHN KER, D.D., 1866-1885.

"Dr. Ker's correspondence is marked by the same delicacy of touch and refinement, the same spirit of wholesome piety, and the same broad interest in all phases of human thought and life which characterise everything he wrote."—Glasgow Herald.

THE CASTELLATED and DOMESTIC ARCHITECTURE of SCOTLAND.

By DAVID MAOGIBBON and THOMAS ROSS.
* * * This work will be completed in 4 volumes, royal 8vo, each containing about 500 Illustrations. The first 3 vols. are now ready, price 42s. each net.

"It is hardly possible to exaggerate the labour involved in the production of the present work, or to speak too highly of the accuracy and completeness of the letter-press and the illustrations. The authors are fairly entitled to boast that they have placed before the reader the minutest particulars about every edifice, castle, peel tower, picturesque ruin.....between Caithness and the southern counties of Scotland. The illustrations number nearly 400. For clearness of outline, fidelity of detail and uniformity of execution, they are truly admirable."—Saturday Review, 2nd March.

LITERATURE.

The New Spirit. By Havelock Ellis. (Bell.)

WALT WHITMAN, Henrik Ibsen, and Count Tolstoi—three more noteworthy living men could hardly have been chosen to write about. The mere selection of the names is a sign of critical discrimination. They are living, and that is probably the reason why so little has yet been said about them to the purpose. Yet we all admit that they are names of mark; we all want to take our bearings with regard to them; we all feel that they belong in a special way to the present, just as Heine belongs in a special way to the last generation; and we want to estimate how far they are likely to pass, like Heine, into the Olympus of the classics—how far, in a word, they bid fair to belong to the future. Though none of these three writers is young, and one is an old man, their spirit is younger and concerns us more than that of many writers who are their juniors by the calendar; and for all these reasons welcome is warmly due to this fresh, buoyant, and sincere volume of essays by Mr. Havelock Ellis.

Diderot, and yet more Heine, who occupy the first two studies in the book, have an interest for every one which can hardly be exhausted; and there are parts of the study on Heine which are not unworthy to be named—it is high praise—with Matthew Arnold's inimitable paper upon that writer, a paper almost as classic as Heine himself. But it is best to hasten on to the most original part of the book, the part that treats of the living—of the great names of America, of Scandinavia, and of Russia.

Could there be a greater, and apparently more dismal, paradox than the sight of the seer of democracy sitting serene under the total neglect of the democracy? If anything could bely the faith of the Democratic Vistas, if anything could make one thick the loud energetic civilisation of America nothing but a gigantic imposture, it is the spectacle of the only great living American poet dependent in his old age upon the sympathy—and at one moment almost upon the maintenance—of foreign friends. And yet he keeps his faith in the faithless people unshaken, for it is not at the mercy of personal neglect or personal discomfort; and, if he is right in his robust belief, surely the solution of the paradox lies in the meaning of that much-abused word the "people." The "people" in whom his confidence burns so unquenchably are not the rich people, not the millions of wire-pullers and place-hunters, not the spurious élite of culture, but the mass of the people, who know little of Whitman and his books, or of any books, who labour obscurely, manfully, and restlessly, who represent the vast sum-total of energy comparable to the energies of nature herself—the mass of the people whose force and fertility are independent of all possible vicissitudes in institutions.

Mr. Ellis's account of this great poet is probably the best that has been supplied by anyone except the poet himself. There is but one departure from sobriety—a sufficiently startling one—in almost his first words. "Whitman," he says, "has been placed while yet alive by the side of the world's greatest teachers, beside Jesus and Socrates." Who said this is not stated; but it would be small honour to be canonised by a person who could perpetrate such a comparison. This is the sole extravagance in the whole essay; but it is not the only thing that will arouse resentment in the orthodox breast. The large number of persons who are blinded to Whitman's genius by the incidental nakedness of his writing would do well to ponder Mr. Ellis's most apposite contrast in this particular of Whitman with Swift. Swift regarded men and women not only as beasts, but as lower than other beasts, on account of the grotesque hypocrisy which leads them to muffle up their beasthood under decorous names; and this mask his dire indignation and misapprehended sincerity impelled him ruthlessly to strip off. There is all the legacy of mediæval body-hatred in the portrait of the Yahoo; and Swift is a Christian manqué. Whitman is a pagan, and takes his nudity as sanely as he does everything else. Neither writer is likely to hurt any healthy and grown person; it is the thin and eager minds, the erotic mystics, who really have the "seminal principle in their brains," not these burly and virile spirits. Where many of Whitman's poems fall short is, in one word, in Art. That is a sufficiently fatal shortcoming, and one which avenges itself speedily by the extinction of the peccant work. Whitman's capacity for inspiration, for prophecy, and for hope is very far ahead of his literary sense; he wrestles with difficulties of expression and construction, and constantly succumbs before them. Now and then he conquers; and an immortal flower of verse is born like or like "Captain! my Captain!" Some, therefore, of the poetry, or rhythmic prose, which contains certain of Whitman's farthest-reaching thought, is artistically faulty; and Mr. Ellis, as befits his somewhat doctrinal purpose, puts aside the question of Whitman's poetic accomplishment, and is engrossed rather with inquiring what creed he can extract from him. This analysis he performs admirably; but, after all, the poetic value of a poet is the most interesting thing about him. Democracy may or may not be what the poet thinks; but he is still a poet and divine. For those who reject the prophet there yet remains the imperishable singer; though it is better still both to share his song and believe his vision.

To go too far in extracting the theories of an artist is often a gross error—it is to offer in a stark and petrified shape what he has instinctively wrapped up in flowing forms of beauty; for analysis has to shatter form, and form is the better part of immortality. Still, one cannot help trying to analyse; particularly authors like Ibsen, who is a man of doctrines as well as a poet, and like Tolstoi, who has analysed himself so much.

Mr. Ellis brings out admirably a truth which would have silenced much of the silly wrangling over Ibsen had it been fully recognised, namely, that such a man, however much he try to preach through an artistic vehicle, remains in his own despite a poet, remains receptive to new points of view, does not tie himself down to his own stage-puppets or to any one utterance of his own—continues, in fact, to live and to expand. Most English people regard Ibsen as a writer who teaches women that have married fools and borne them children to disown the children and desert the fools. This is not quite a complete account of the matter; but even those who have read the half-dozen dramas which until the other day were all that the English public have known have inevitably gained a one-sided view of the writer. They cannot see that he is primarily a poet, and that his best work must be judged not even by a dramatic standard, still less by a doctrinaire standard, but by the requirements of that vesture of harmonious thought in perfect language which constitutes poetry.

But the poet of Brand, of Peer Gynt, and of the Poems, is practically unknown to the English reader, and seems likely to remain so. Few people care to learn Danish; and these poems are infinitely harder to translate than the prose dramas, their aroma is infinitely harder to preserve. The result is, that Ibsen, who is really a considerable poet, is certain to be mistaken—in England at least—for a clever preaching playwright. There is, indeed, plenty of poetry latent in his prose plays; but the poetry tends to get overlaid by the doctrine, and while we have not before us the dramatic poems as a corrective, the mistake is sure to continue. In Germany things are different. Almost every word of Ibsen's writing is translated into German, and in consequence the Germans have a much juster idea of his magnitude.

Mr. Ellis's essay is, in the main, a reprint of his introduction to the well-known little volume in the "Camelot Series," in which three of Ibsen's prose dramas are translated. Nothing could be better done, nothing could better stimulate interest and retain it. Its account of the poet's life and its exposition of his leading ideas are alike temperate and keen. One thing may be added, and it is this: Ibsen is a grandchild of Byron. The great wave of Byronic influence in Europe is not spent, though its direction be changed. There is the same energy, the same irony, the same sincerity, the same unsparing exposure of the existing social order, in "Brand" as in "Don Juan." But the spirit has had its form vastly altered. Byron very seldom had perfection and distinction of style; and perhaps this was the vengeance upon all his distractions and weaknesses of character. Ibsen, though dealing with a far inferior language, and living amid a far feebler literary tradition than the Englishman, yet makes a far more finished use of his materials; indeed, in his own way, he is to be named among the truly eminent writers—among men, that is, like Swift and Leopardi. Still, if the hand is the hand of Swift and Leopardi, the voice is the voice of Byron and of Heine; there is eternally the note of freedom, of personal assertion, of contest and protest—contest and protest in behalf of humanity and truth. So long as a formula is kept as wide and generous as this, it is impossible that it should spoil or warp an artist's work, or that it should do anything but quicken that work and give it the salt of life.

We have but little space left in which to speak of Mr. Ellis's study of Tolstoi with the attention that it demands. Much of the essay is taken up with what most readers of Tolstoi know—his life, his phases of doubt, and their open-air solution. But the best passages are those in which Zola is dealt with in the light afforded by Tolstoi. Matthew Arnold, with his strange prejudices of temperament, dismissed Zola and all his fellows with a sentence from George Sand to the effect that dealing with "the mysteries of iniquity" "is not literature." This is too summary: Zola does not go down under blows like this; he can write literature, and he has to be reckoned with. Mr. Ellis not only brings out this neglected truth, but also puts his finger on the blot of the realistic method, and his words may well be quoted:

"A great artist . . . is not afraid of any fact, however repulsive it may seem, so long as it is significant. But it must be significant. Without sympathy and a severe criticism of details, the truly illuminating facts will be missed or lost in the heap."

And a little later:

"He [Zola] has turned the tide of novel literature, wherever his influence has spread, from frivolous inanities to the painstaking study of the facts of human life. Whatever we may think for the moment, that is a very wholesome and altogether moral revolution."

These are surely the sanest remarks that have been made about Emile Zola for many a long day! They have the advantage of disposing of what Prof. Huxley called the other day "the a priori bigots on both sides"—both the rabid theoretical realist, who would suffer martyrdom for what is simply common or unclean, and the horror-stricken British matron. The latter is warned against the "frivolous inanities" that occupy her existence, and sent to Zola for a tonic; and the former receives the needful warning that his facts must "be significant."

Space forces me to stop at the most interesting point of Mr. Ellis's book. "Tolstoi," he says, "brings us face to face with religion"; and it is to an analysis of the constituents of religion that all this criticism has led up. While the introductory chapter attempts to analyse "the New Spirit," the concluding one attempts to generalise a creed from the data which are afforded by the analysis. About this effort only one thing can here be said. Mr. Ellis should devote a volume and not a chapter to each of these topics. At times he seems to try and distil the ocean into a nutshell; the quintessence is sometimes very exquisite, but it needs dilution. Also, there is too much use made of books, and too little of direct experience, to make us feel that the conclusions are altogether first hand. For, after all, it is far less a man's knowledge of books than the outpouring of his personal consciousness that inclines us to hearken to his gospel. That Mr. Ellis could really give us this first-hand element appears from the passage (p.194) embodying a fragment of the author's experience, which stands out in living relief from the mass of critical disquisition, and which alone would make the book remarkable. But the last word upon so suggestive and finished a piece of work ought to be one of ungrudging praise.

OLIVER ELTON.

A History of the Four Georges. By Justin McCarthy. Vol. II. (Chatto & Windus.)

THE title-page of Mr. Justin McCarthy's volume furnishes a critic with a ready opportunity to grumble. It deludes the reader into the belief that the contents will be devoted to a description of the lives and an examination of the characters of the four Georges of the house of Brunswick; but this is far from being the object which their author has set himself to accomplish. The volumes form rather a series of essays on the events of English history from the accession of the earliest of the race to the death, in 1830, of "the first gentleman in Europe." George II., the incidents of whose reign are described in the present volume, loved neither poets nor painters, and only took an interest in their lives in the fear that his virtues might be distorted, or his foibles magnified, in the pictures of the one and the satires of the other; but the death of Defoe and of Gay form the subject of its opening pages. It is curious as characteristic of Mr. McCarthy's fondness for exhuming from its neglected burial-place some dramatic allusion, or some whimsical coincidence, that in passing from the death of Defoe he drags to light the circumstance that in the same month of the same year (April, 1731) "Mrs. Elizabeth Cromwell, daughter of Richard Cromwell, the Protector, and granddaughter of Oliver Cromwell, died at her house in Bedford Row." Religion did not interest either the king himself or any of his family, with the exception of the wife who ruled him, and her sympathies inclined to the bishops and clergymen generally deemed of doubtful orthodoxy; but a chapter on the Wesleyan movement forms a part of Mr. McCarthy's labours. The growth of Britain beyond the seas had no charm for the second George. The sole territory outside England for which he felt any desire or anxiety was the beloved electorate of Hanover. But the king's dominions expanded over fresh continents in both hemispheres; and two of the most entertaining chapters in the volume deal with Clive's victories in India, and Wolfe's defeat of the French on the heights of Abraham, near Quebec. On these points the royal ignorance was as great as that of the minister with whom he was longest associated, the Duke of Newcastle; but Mr. McCarthy, whatever may be the logical limitations of his title-page, travels in his enterprise far outside the ken of both king and courtier.

After this preliminary complaint, it is only fair to acknowledge that Mr. McCarthy usually succeeds in interesting the reader. It would not be possible for him to alter materially, however deep his researches might be, the accepted version of the history of the last century; and he does not pretend to be an explorer of records or State papers. The work of quarrying he leaves to others, but he reserves to himself the right of using their discoveries. He does not fail, however, to keep himself abreast of their studies, and his prefatory note is a proof of this. The vexed questions, often debated and never settled, whether a certain Capt. Jenkins had lost his ear at all, and whether, if it were missing, it had been cut off by the Spaniards near Havannah or removed in a London pillory, have again been the subject of an elaborate article; and Mr. McCarthy draws attention to the paper with the remark that the documents seem to leave the matter in as much doubt as ever.

In describing the characters of the chief combatants in the political world when Walpole was its head, it is clear that the latest historian has his likes and dislikes. In the first class the stately figure of Sir William Wyndham stands out pre-eminently, but with the feeling in the reader's mind that the excellence of Wyndham's heart is magnified at the expense of his head. He was put in the forefront of the attack by Bolingbroke and Pulteney, in the belief that his pure consistency of political purpose might draw attention from their own interested opposition. Allied with these men in political life he was, his apologist pleads, but "only in a general honest thought and common good to all." And when he dies Mr. McCarthy bewails his loss with a pity denied to all the other leaders in the strife.

"He was one of the few, the very few, really unselfish and high-minded men who then occupied a prominent position in Parliament. He was not fighting for his own hand. He was not a mere partisan. He had enough of the statesman in him to be able to accept established facts and not to argue with the inexorable. He was not a scholar like Carteret or an orator like Bolingbroke; he was not an ascetic, but he had stainless political integrity, and was a true friend to his friends."

Very few men indeed deserved such language at this epoch in our national life. Shippen was perhaps the only other politician of the day to whom such phrases might be applied, and his private life was mean and sordid compared with the princely generosity of Wyndham.

Another of Mr. McCarthy's favourites, perhaps the chief of them all, is Lord Chesterfield; and the secret for this partiality is easily found. The defeats of the English ministry in the attempt to supply the Irish people with a copper coinage, through a patent granting to Wood the privilege of putting into circulation an enormous number of halfpence and farthings, had proved the necessity of sending to Dublin Castle, as the country's viceragent, a peer possessed of judgment and quickness. Carteret went into this unwelcome banishment, and his rule at last brought quiet once more into Irish affairs. A few years later it fell to Chesterfield's lot to fill the same office. To the outward eye the new ruler seemed to have little in sympathy with the people whom he was sent to govern. Even his wit was out of harmony with the proverbial instincts of that humorous race, and it seemed a foregone conclusion that his rule at the Castle would have rendered his subjects still more disaffected and have ruined for all time his own reputation for administrative ability. The result was far different. He proved, says his latest panegyrist, "that he knew how to govern a nation which no English statesman before his time or since was able to rule from Dublin Castle." The eulogy is, perhaps, too strongly expressed; but the exaggeration, if it exists at all, is but natural in the mind of an Irish leader, and Mr. Lecky, writing in more restrained language, acknowledges that Chesterfield's vice-royalty was "eminently successful."

Somewhat to our surprise, Mr. McCarthy severs himself from the rest of English historians in endeavouring to put a more charitable construction on some of the acts of "only Fred," the ill-fated eldest son of the second George. He points out that all his family had committed themselves up to the hilt in opposition to the future king, and that every anecdote which descends to us on his doings comes from a tainted source. Some good points the prince undoubtedly had. Through his exertions, protracted from sunset to sunrise, one of the quaintest parts of London topography was saved from destruction. He was fond of his wife, and was not above confessing his partiality for her both in person and mind. If he did endeavour to obtain some more money from his father, and was not particular as to the means which he employed to get it, even his enemies must allow that the royal sire had kept his son for many years far short of the income which his position in life needed. In connexion with this hapless prince Mr. McCarthy has penned one of the pages which we wish that he had omitted from his work. He could not be expected to omit the famous epitaph which some caustic satirists revived and applied to the whole royal family; but it was certainly not worthy of the historian's reputation to drag from the obscurity of the library shelves the verses indited by the University of Oxford on the prince's decease in order that the world might be told that "Many scholastic gentlemen mourned in Greek; James Stillingfleet found vent in Hebrew; Mr. Betts concealed his tears under the cloak of the Syriac speech; George Costard sorrowed in Arabic," and so on through all the languages of ancient and modern times. Similar effusions, not a whit more creditable, were, under the dictation of the University dons at Cambridge and Oxford, poured out by their more promising pupils for many generations; but fortunately they have for the most part been left in appropriate neglect. If Mr. McCarthy seems to hold a brief in the interest of "only Fred," he makes up for it in the condemnation of his brother, the Duke of Cumberland. All the rumours which have been handed down to us of the cruelties practised on the defeated Scotch after the battle of Culloden are accepted by him as authentic statements of ascertained facts. Even the story that he ordered one of his officers to shoot a wounded Highlander who was staring at him, and that the officer bluntly refused to execute so inhuman a deed, is accepted as a tale "which might well be true," and which "we may hope to be true, as it adds another ornament to the historic decoration of a brave man," to the credit of the officer who declined the act.

It does not enter into the plan of Mr. McCarthy's work to deal with the subtler changes which were passing through the government of England at this period. He makes no attempt to trace the gradual growth of cabinet governments, or to describe the rise of the exceptional authority of the prime minister. Such points of discussion are left for the investigation of the constitutional historian. Walpole is, of course, the predominant figure in the larger half of Mr. McCarthy's volume; and, taken as a whole, his view of that statesman's character affords no just ground of complaint. It is curious, as showing the difference between two political historians in dealing with the same event, that the story of Walpole stooping just before his ejection from office to intrigue with the Pretender in the hope of catching the Jacobite vote is adopted in a few offhand sentences by Mr. McCarthy as a probable intrigue on his part, while Mr. Morley, on the other hand, discusses its probability in three closely-reasoned pages, and finally dismisses it as incredible.

The first half of the last century abounds in interesting events; and as Mr. McCarthy has a keen eye for a dramatic situation, the interest of the piece does not fall off in his hands. The assertion that Lord Carteret "was exiled to the House of Lords" on his becoming Earl Granville by the death of his mother is, of course, a blunder, as he had long possessed a seat in that assembly. Such a word as "he pomped it with more than Oriental splendour" should not be allowed to blot the narrative. As a popular introduction to the history of England under the second George, this volume is entitled to just commendation.

W. P. COURTNEY.

A SIXTEENTH-CENTURY TREATISE ON THE GLOBES.

Hues' Treatise on the Globes. Edited, with Annotated Indices and an Introduction, by Clements R. Markham.

Sailing Directions (from a Fifteenth Century MS.). Edited by James Gairdner, with a Glossary by E. Delmar Morgan. (Hakluyt Society.)

THE Hakluyt Society aims at opening "an easier access to the sources of a branch of knowledge which yields to none in importance, and is superior to most in agreeable variety," by editing and printing rare or unpublished records of the work of early travellers and geographers. This branch of geographical work, which was considered a necessity in the days of Hakluyt and of Purchas, is even more indispensable now than it was then. For geography is essentially a progressive science; and as the unknown portions of the globe become more circumscribed, and the constant supply of fresh information modifies preconceived theories and opinions, so there is less and less opportunity for mere daring exploration, and an ever increasing necessity for a sound knowledge of comparative geography. The days when great results might be hoped for from a brilliant dash into the unknown are gone for ever, and success can now be achieved only by scientific knowledge and sagacious inference, approved by known facts. And since it is not possible to appreciate the position of geographical science in our own day without comparing it with the ideas and methods of our predecessors, the Hakluyt Society does important and valuable work by placing within our reach the records of their labours and discoveries. The volume issued by the society this year contains Hues' Tractatus de Globis, and some curious sailing directions from a fifteenth century MS.

The Tractatus was written as a guide to the use of the Molyneux globes, which were the first ever constructed in this country, and the largest that had been made up to the time of their publication, in the hope that it might be useful in advancing the art of navigation. It is needless to say that Mr. Markham's introduction is a comprehensive and masterly commentary on the whole subject. He passes in detailed review all the globes which preceded or were contemporaneous with the first made in England, so far as a knowledge of them has come down to us, from the armillary spheres of the ancients to the globes of Mercator; the Molyneux globes themselves are fully described; and an analysis of the manual for their use completes a deeply interesting and valuable essay.

In the days of Elizabeth, "our Kingdome at that time being well furnished in ships and impatient of idleness," the interest of the nation had become fully aroused on all questions relating to geographical research, and English seamen had begun "to contend even with the Spaniard and Portugall himselfe for the glory of navigation." It was only natural, therefore, that these deeds should be worthily recorded.

"When Drake and Cavendish had circumnavigated the globe, when Raleigh had planted Virginia, Davis had discovered his straits, and Lancaster had found his way to India, the time had come for Hakluyt to publish his Principal Navigations, and for Molyneux to construct his globes."

But although Englishmen were thus coming to the front as discoverers and explorers, it was "the opinion of many understanding men that their endeavours had taken the lesse effect meerely through ignorance," and the lack of a "reasonable competency of skill in geometry and astronomy"; and it would have been strange, indeed, if attempts had not been made to remedy this defect. The attention of many of the ablest men in both universities was accordingly turned to the subject, and several learned cosmographers and mathematicians made sea voyages expressly to acquire practical experience of the requirements of navigators. This enabled them to do more for the advancement of nautical science than they could possibly have accomplished by theoretical study alone, and it was in this way that Hues himself was enabled to turn his learning and ripe knowledge to such good account.

The two famous globes which formed the subject of Hues' treatise, and were also described by Hood and Blundeville, were constructed by Emery Molyneux—of whom very little is recorded beyond the fact that he was an able mathematician and draftsman—and published about the end of 1592. The expenses were defrayed by Master William Sanderson, one of the most munificent and patriotic of those merchant princes of London who did so much to advance the interests of geography and the prosperity of their country in the time of Elizabeth. It is probable that the employment of Molyneux by Sanderson was due to the recommendation of John Davis, the Arctic navigator, who evidently assisted in the preparation of the globes, while Hakluyt, and many eminent navigators and mathematicians also gave help and advice. The appearance of the globes, which are two feet two inches in diameter, beautifully executed and well mounted, naturally caused a great sensation, and many replicas were produced and sold. Only one set, however, has been preserved, and that one is now in the library of the Middle Temple, "a strange depository for geographical documents of such interest and importance." Mr. Markham considers it highly probable that they were included in the library of Robert Ashley, an old Templar who died in 1641, and left all his books to the Inn which was almost entirely his home during the latter years of his long life; and that "it was in this way that they found a last resting place—one may almost say a burial place—in the library of the Middle Temple." An engraving (after a photograph) of the celestial globe is given as a frontispiece.

Master Robert Hues was born in 1553, in a village called Little Hereford (pronounced Harford), which is eight miles north-east of Leominster, and is separated from Worcestershire by the river Teme; but nothing is known as to his parentage. He took his degree at Oxford in about 1578,* and soon afterwards devoted himself to the study of geography and astronomy. At Oxford he was noted as a good classical scholar, and he afterwards became a celebrated mathematician. He was the intimate friend and executor of Sir Walter Raleigh; and he was with Thomas Cavendish in his last voyage to the Straits of Magellan, sharing in all the privations and hardships of that ill-fated expedition. He must have returned to England just at the time when the Molyneux Globes were published, for his manual was written in the following year, and published in 1594. During the last years of his life, Robert Hues resided almost entirely at Oxford; and there he died, in his eightieth year, on the 24th of May, 1632, in the "Stone House."

The Tractatus opens with an epistle dedication to Sir Walter Raleigh, in which the discoveries made by Englishmen during the reign of the great queen are recapitulated; while the preface is chiefly devoted to proving the sphericity of the earth, and confuting the arguments of those who maintained that the mountains prevented the earth's surface from being round, and that a liquid surface is flat. The treatise itself is divided into five parts, the first treating of things which are common to both globes; the second devoted to the planets, fixed stars, and their constellations; the third to a description of land and sea portrayed on the terrestrial globe, and to a discussion respecting the circumference of the earth; and the fourth explains the use of the globes. The fifth part consists of a learned treatise by Master Heriot on the rhumb lines and their uses. Master Hues reviews at some length the knowledge possessed by the Greeks and Egyptians, for in his day students still treated the work of the ancients with respect, and discussed their methods; and while the advances and improvements of later times were welcomed, the philosophers whose labours and discoveries are recorded in the "Almagest" and "Geography" of Ptolemy, were looked upon as the founders of nautical science. He also propounds various problems in navigation, and utterly scouts the idea of finding longitude "by the helpe of sunne dials, or clocks, or houre glasses, either with water or sand, or the like." Such toys were worthless; and those who sold them, "to the great abuse and expense of some men of good note and quality, who are perhaps better stored with money than either learning and judgment," were "impostors." "Away," cried Master Hues, "with all such trifling, cheating rascals!"

The second part of the Tractatus supplied an admirable explanatory guide to the celestial globe; but the fourth part, in which the practical uses to which the globe may be put by the navigator are described, was the most important in the eyes of the author, and was the one by means of which he hoped to be of most service to his countrymen. Previous to the discovery of logarithms the globe was a great boon to navigators, as it supplied methods of finding the place of the sun, latitude, course and distance, amplitudes and azimuths, time and declination, by inspection. Consequently, it came into very general use on board ship; and as a practical guide to its use the treatise of Hues became a most valuable book to sailors, "so that it played no unimportant part in furthering the exploring enterprises of Englishmen in the seventeenth century." The English title-page tells us that it was "Written first in Latine. . . . Afterward Illustrated with Notes, by Io. Isa. Pontanus," and "lastly made English, for the benefit of the Vnlearned." It was also translated into Dutch and French, and altogether went through thirteen editions.

The Index Geographicus, which exists only in one or two editions, is a long and very complete list of places, with their latitudes and longitudes, and will be a useful help towards the identification of old names, or of names made obscure by peculiar spellings. Mr. Markham has added a biographical index containing short notices of astronomers and mathematicians, as well as references to the places in the text where their names occur, and an astronomical index prepared on the same plan. Indices of names of places and scientific terms occurring in the text are also given.

In his account of the unique mediaeval MS., now printed for the first time, which has been appended to Hues' treatise, Mr. James Gairdner, of the Public Record Office, tells us that among the Lansdowne MSS. in the British Museum is a folio volume "the greatest part of which," according to the catalogue, "formerly belonged to Sir John Paston, Knight, in the reign of Edward IV." It consists of a number of short tracts, two treatises of more considerable length, and the tract containing directions for the circum-navigation of England. Mr. Gairdner discusses at some length the question whether the MS. did or did not belong to Sir John Paston, and follows its history down until it passed into the possession of the first Marquis of Lansdowne, and thus became a portion of the Lansdowne library, now in the British Museum. To whomsoever the MS. originally belonged there can be no doubt about the antiquity of the handwriting, or that this particular tract was written by William Ebesham, Sir John Paston's transcriber. It is, therefore, a genuine specimen of the sailing directions with which navigators had to be content in the days of John and Sebastian Cabot.

At the present time, the ground covered by this tract of twenty pages, which includes directions not only for the circumnavigation of England and Ireland, but also for a voyage to the Straits of Gibraltar, occupies no less than nine respectable volumes of the "Admiralty Pilots," or sailing directions, each volume dealing exhaustively with its own particular portion of coast. The dictum that "easy reading is hard writing" applies in full force to sailing directions (experto crede); and bearing in mind the laborious care and wealth of material represented by these volumes, which are written for "unlearned" sailors as well as scientific navigators, the result of the comparison is decidedly satisfactory. Unfortunately, seamen do not always utilise to the full extent the advantages so freely placed at their disposal. The early navigators pored over their "Rutters of the Sea" until they probably knew them by heart; but the modern "Pilots" are too often neglected until a rock crops up where no rock should be, and then they are eagerly searched in the desperate hope that a peg may be found on which to hang the blame due to careless or reckless navigation.

Mr. E. Delmar Morgan has rendered the old directions intelligible by means of an excellent glossary, with introductory remarks, and a map on which the names of places are marked in their old and modern forms. The work of identification has evidently been not only a labour of love but pretty hard labour to boot; and it is easy to believe that "many of the names appeared, at first sight, hopelessly difficult," and that "it was only after patient investigation and research that their meaning became clear—for who would suspect that 'Leyrnes' referred to the well-known town of Wainfleet, or that 'the Shelde' was no other than the now fashionable sea-bathing place of Cromer; that 'Whitvies,' 'the Spone,' and 'Wolveshorde' were respectively Whitby, the Spurnhead, and Dunnose Point? Passing to the other side of the English Channel, or the channel of Flanders, as it was then called, we find such names as 'the Hagge' for Cape La Hague, 'Hoggis' for Cape La Hougue, 'Berfietnes' for Cape Barfleur, and many other curiosities."

All these difficulties, and many others, have, however, been successfully surmounted; and the result is a most curious and interesting specimen of the small beginnings from which may be said to have sprung the valuable directories now issued by the Hydrographic Department of the Admiralty for all the navigable coasts of the world.

GEORGE T. TEMPLE.

* It is not easy to find him in Mr. Andrew Clarke's Register of the University of Oxford, 1571 to 1622 (Oxford Historical Society). There was indeed a Robert Hughes, of Magdalen Hall, who took the degree of B.A. in 1578; but he is identified by the editor with Robert Hughes, of Magdalen Hall, who matriculated circa 1574, and is then described as "Bucks., gen. f., aetat. 17." There was another Robert Hughes, also of Magdalen Hall, in 1573, whose age would suit better; but of him no particulars are known.—ED ACADEMY.

Axel. Par le Comte Villiers de l'Isle-Adam.
(Paris: Quantin.)

Axel is a Rosicrucian story of the accomplishment of human destiny by means of renunciation. The hero and heroine are two orphans, the last descendants of a noble race, and they are brought together by the working of a mysterious temptation. Sara de Maupers leaves a convent and renounces Faith; Axel, of Auersperg, the young lord of the Black Forest, educated in the occult sciences, renounces Knowledge—both of them tempted by the secret of a hidden treasure, which they discover in a mountain cavern, mysteriously connected with the funeral vault of the castle of Auersperg. Having found this royal wealth, they disdain it; falling in love with one another, they deem life incapable of realising their dream of happiness, and decide to die together:

"L'accomplissement réel, absolu, parfait, c'est le moment intérieur que nous avons éprouvé l'un de l'autre. . . Ce moment idéal, nous l'avons subi: le voici donc irrévocable, de quelque nom que tu le nommes. Essayer de le revivre, en modelant chaque jour à son image une poussière toujours décevante d'apparences extérieures, ne serait que risquer de le dénaturer, d'en amoindrir l'expression divine, de l'anéantir au plus pur de nous-mêmes. Prenons garde de ne pas savoir mourir pendant qu'il en est temps encore."

Axel should be read for its beauties of style and imagination, perfect rhythm and grace of poetical diction.

WILLIAM MARKHEIM.

Leaves of a Life. By Montagu Williams, Q.C. In two vols. (Macmillan.)

THE seamy side of human life has an irresistible attraction for those who live on the right side of it; and so Mr. Montagu Williams's Old Bailey reminiscences have become the book of the season.

The first volume is decidedly entertaining, in spite of—or, perhaps, because of—the extraordinary discursiveness and lack of finish which characterise it. This discursiveness seems to be a natural product of the Old Bailey, and not an idiosyncrasy of Mr. Montagu Williams, for it was as strongly marked in Serjeant Ballantine's reminiscences as it is in these. It comes, one may suppose, from the fact that, as ninety-nine out of every hundred people who are tried for serious offences are guilty, the only chance for the prisoner's advocate is to try and distract the attention of the jury from the main issues to some irrelevant point. Discursiveness is a considerable assistance, and is cultivated accordingly, until it becomes second nature. To this effect was the advice Mr. Montagu Williams reports as given by Serjeant Ballantine as to what to do in a bad case—"Oh, just jump in and splash about." Compare, too, the story of a Mr. C., who, when defending a man for horse stealing in a "dead" case, "addressed the jury in something like (note the 'something like') the following terms":

"Gentlemen, I have been among you for a great many years. I was born in your county, and my people were with you for two or three generations. You have always been friendly with me, man and boy. . . A change has now come over my life. Her Majesty has sent for me to make me one of her own counsel. I shall never address you again. This is the last time my voice will be heard in your ancient hall. Let us part as we have always been—the best of friends."

The foreman of the jury at once said, "We find for Mr. C.," and the prisoner was released. To the same effect, also, is a story of Ribton making a long speech before Mr. Justice Wightman:

"'Mr. Ribton, you've said that before.' 'Have I, my lord, I'm very sorry, I quite forgot it.' 'Don't apologise, Mr. Ribton, I forgive you, for it was a very long time ago.'"

And so a good many of the stories Mr. Williams has to tell never come to any particular point or have any particular moral in them. In the second volume this is especially marked. Indeed, there is hardly a chapter in it worth reading, except that about the "counsellor's dawg," in which he recovered a stolen dog on payment of £20. When he remonstrated with the thieves for having stolen from such an excellent friend of the profession, the leader said:

"That's the best of it. Lord, sir, you should have seen how my pal Bill did laugh. 'Aint it rather hard,' says I, 'to take the counsellor's dawg?' 'Not a bit, Jim,' says he, 'he's had a good lot out of us, and why shouldn't we get a little out of him.'"

This joke, however, cost the stealer dear, as Mr. Williams afterwards prosecuted him for another dog theft, and ran him in for eighteen months for the dog and twelve months more for the collar; and the man was heard to say as he left the dock, "Thought he'd have me some day. He's made me pay d—dear at last for those pieces." With the exception of this incident—very well told—there is little in the second volume, which is padded out with the author's speeches in the Lefroy and Lamson murder cases. In fact, to imitate his practice of appending Latin tags to his chapters, it is a case of "desinit in piscem."

Perhaps one of the most striking things about the author's career at the bar, besides its tragic but happily not fatal finish, was the long time it took him to settle down to the profession. Though his family was, he says, steeped in law for generations—his great-grandfather a Chancery barrister, his grandfather a solicitor, and his father on the Oxford circuit—he tried being a schoolmaster, a soldier, an actor, and a playwright, before he went to the Bar; and he had made the acquaintance of money-lenders and the police-courts as a victim before he began to get his living out of them. When he did go to the Bar, though his first case filled him with despair of success, his success was remarkably rapid. He claims to have defended more prisoners than any other living man, and implies also that he had defended more successfully. With great frankness he conveys his belief in the guilt of by far the greater number of his clients. On the occasion of what he calls "the most cruel and heartless murder in his experience," his client the night after his acquittal paraded the High Street drunk, and, holding out his hand, said, "My counsel got me off, but this is the hand that did the deed"; and, in one of his first causes célèbres, he successfully defended Catherine Wilson for attempt to murder, only for her to be immediately taken into custody on seven separate charges of actual murder. On the other hand, he gives at least two cases of wrongful conviction, and argues therefrom for that necessary institution, a Court of Criminal Appeal, though it is only fair to say that in neither case would an appeal have resulted to all appearances in a different verdict, as both were cases of mistaken identity, and the mistake was only discovered by the subsequent confession of the true culprit. There are some tales of acquittals connected with juries which sound remarkably highly coloured, one especially in which a melancholy Jew figures as a self-offered jurymen, prepared to disagree with the other eleven in a "dead" case, and successfully carrying out his design by his plentiful provision of sandwiches and sherry. But all the Hebrew tales, of which there are several, especially in connexion with Ballantine, have a quite Hebraistic or Hellenistic ring about them, though perhaps they are none the worse for that.

The interest of the book, however, hardly lies in its good stories, which are few, and very few of quotable length, but in a general jauntiness of style; and the retelling of some celebrated murder cases, which always attract as our only modern substitute for the ancient amphitheatre.

NEW NOVELS.

By Woman's Favour. By Henry Erroll. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

Among Aliens. By Frances Eleanor Trollope. In 2 vols. (Spencer Blackett.)

The Gold of Ophir. By Elizabeth J. Lysaght. In 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

Glenathole. By Cyril Grey. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

The Blindness of Memory Earle. By Charles T. C. James. (Remington.)

The Celebrated Janet Homfrey. By Percy Fendall. (Gardner & Co.)

King Squash of Taddyland. By an Envoy Extraordinary. (Field & Tuer.)

THERE is not so much passion in By Woman's Favour as there was in The Academician or An Ugly Duckling, nor is there quite so much reality in it, looked upon simply as a character-study. Yet it is the cleverest book that Henry Erroll has produced—regarded, indeed, from the standpoint of plot-construction, it is almost faultlessly clever. There is no slovenly writing or careless draughtsmanship; the plots within the main plot do not interfere with each other, or with the central action of the story; and, although there is society in it, both Bohemian and other, this is neither too vulgar nor too high. The title has a French look; and, in the hands of such an artist as M. Zola, and, still more, of M. Guy de Maupassant, what a study in human selfishness would the literary adventurer who, in London, styles himself George L'Estrange, have become! Being English, and therefore ambitious, self-regarding and light-hearted rather than selfish to the core, he merely becomes engaged to and jilts his London landlady's daughter; he makes merely ineffectual love to the wife of the theatrical manager who employs him; and when, finally, in the last chapter, he appears in the two characters of successful playwright and husband of the pretty puritan, Dorothy Wyvern, no liaison casts its shadow on his domestic happiness, which seems likely in the long run to become rather dreary and conventional. It is just as well, indeed, that George Collins or L'Estrange should be made, by Henry Erroll's skill, to play but a secondary part in By Woman's Favour. He is not satisfactory, and his success in London is decidedly improbable. There is, of course, no reason why the admired poet and baritone of a Manchester tavern should not become the writer of acceptable leading articles and successful plays in London. But George L'Estrange gives no evidence of superior ability; his cleverness is altogether superficial; and the keen eyes of Mrs. Fellowes see through him and into the virtual imposture of his assumptions of gentility to some purpose. But his residence in the house of the disreputable actor, Mellon, permits of the presentation of some very delightful pictures of essentially low-class London life, with its warm-heartedness, its vulgarity, its petty miseries, and its shabby delights. Both Mrs. Mellon and her daughter Lucy, whose simple souls never rise above bloaters and shirt buttons, will be appreciated a good deal more than George L'Estrange, who writhes—though not more than he deserves—under the affectionate but greasy familiarities to which he is subjected in his character of Lucy's "young man." There is a suspicion of "comic copy" in the jealousy and antics of Jarvis, who plays so uncomplainingly the part of second string to Lucy's bow. The two truly leading characters in By Woman's Favour, are Jim Fellowes, the theatrical manager, and his wife Helen; although not a few readers of the story will, looking at it simply as a series of character-sketches, be disposed to give the places of honour to the actress Gwendolin and her elfish quasi-sister Prue. But the triumph of Fellowes' devoted love for his wife, and her own renunciation of her dangerous but not unnatural affection for another and more loveable man, are in every sense the best incidents in this story. As a mere novelist's trick, too, the episode of the anonymous letter by which poor Prue tries at once to open the eyes of Fellowes and to secure Mrs. Fellowes' lover for her "sister," but which only brings about her own death and salvation to the man she warns, is perfect in its way. In all respects By Woman's Favour is a sound piece of literary workmanship, and a good and enjoyable book.

Among Aliens is, comparatively speaking, a disappointing book—that is to say, it is not quite so good a story as one has a right to expect from its author. The Italian sketches are good. The two sisters—simple sentimental Lucy and her guardian Catherine, who is surely, however, somewhat too much of a Martha to have the making of a good artist in her—make excellent foils. The game of cross-purposes in which Catherine engages with Reuben Rutherford is a pretty one, even although it is as old as fiction. But the ecclesiastico-aristocratic plot which is formed to secure the person and fortune of Lucy, is rather too Borgian and elaborate for this century, or even for the last; and although the scoundrel-prince of the story deserves the fate which is meted out to him in the end, the seduction and revenge that lead up to it are, it must surely be allowed, somewhat too conventionally Italian. There are all the elements not only of a good but of a well-written story in Among Aliens; but, unfortunately, they are not made enough of.

The Gold of Ophir is an excellent romance of a very old-fashioned kind. Two cousins, bearing the same name, James Ardell, meet with an accident when travelling on the Continent. The bad cousin escapes with an injured arm, whereas the good cousin is left for dead. Even when he recovers, his reason is gone. The two young men are, of course, as like as two peas; so the wicked James, having taken care to steal his cousin's locket and papers, has no difficulty in achieving a feat of personation and passing himself off as the heir to the warm-hearted Dives, John Ardell, to whom has come the "Gold of Ophir." He is no match for Destiny, however. A neglected wife appears; and his cousin, having been restored to sanity by a marvellous expert in brain disease, confronts and confounds him. It is the human environment of the millionaire that is the feature par excellence of The Gold of Ophir—shrewd Lawyer Barton, with his loyal and loveable daughter Peggy, the essentially mean and self-regarding clerical half-brother of John Ardell, and, above all, Miss Judith. Mme. Enderlin, the motherly soul who nurses the real James Ardell back to life in St. Johann, is also a delightful sketch. Altogether, there is a healthy and pleasant warmth of simple sentiment in Gold of Ophir which will cause it to be read, when more ambitious and subtly—but also coldly—psychological novels are neglected.

Practically all that need be said of Glenathole is that the author has evidently in him—or perhaps in her—the making of a good novelist of the eminently popular school of Scotch fiction of which the authoress of Aldersyde is the head. As this book stands, it is far too long; it contains far too many characters; and the writing is occasionally effusive to a fault. But it is, from the literary point of view, a most conscientious performance. The old Scotch ideals of piety and purity are kept well before the reader. And at least four characters in it—Kenneth Errol, the moral weakling; Raymond Dunbar, the young man who is too good to live long; Mary Errol, the pretty saint; and Jessy Douglas, who is as much of a flirt as any good Scotch girl can ever be supposed to be—are quite as well executed portraits as any to be found in the gallery of the artist who is still best known by her maiden name of Annie S. Swan. The worthy old minister, moreover, is just such a character as the writer of Lights and Shadows of Scotch Life would have delighted in portraying. Cyril Grey is not specially successful as an artist in scoundrelism. Lesley—the extraordinary civil servant, who is in reality the chief of a band of smugglers, and who constitutes the "bad company" that "leads astray" the naturally good young man, Kenneth Errol—is an impossibility in Scotland, though he might have been a possibility in the Isle of Wight in the days when smuggling was a branch of industry in which it was considered legitimate for even respectable folk to take part secretly. If Glenathole be a first effort, it must be accounted a promising one. Cyril Grey should prune, but also persevere.

There is a good deal of cleverness diffused over The Blindness of Memory Earle. The relations between the Vicar, Stephen Allardyce, and his very much better and stronger half are so amusing that one could have wished the author of this book had given us more humour and less domestic tragedy than he has done. But the story is not sufficiently compact; and the blindness of Memory Earle to the affection both of the man and of the woman, who love him is tiresome in the extreme. Merrett, too, maudlin in his attachment to the man who has befriended him when he is sunk in moral weakness—as he is maudlin in all things—is a very unsatisfactory character. The initial lodging-house chapters are the best in a book which, on the whole, is a rather provoking one, because the middle and final scenes do not by any means sustain the promise of the beginning.

The Celebrated Janet Homfrey is a clever story by a clever writer, who has set himself to beat conventional sensationalists on their own field. Mr. Fendall has gained a certain measure of success by telling a singularly unpleasant story with a violently original plot. Two brothers fall in love with the same woman, who has sworn to be avenged on the seducer—and to all intents and purposes murderer as well—of her sister. This scoundrel turns out to be the particular brother whose love Janet Homfrey cannot help reciprocating. She kills Robert Drummond—though the actual blow which causes his death is struck in self-defence—when she discovers who he is. Then, of course, Gilbert Drummond is accused of the murder of his brother, and is on the point of being condemned when Janet, by a timely confession, saves him, and then goes mad. The story in The Celebrated Janet Homfrey is everything, and a powerful but repellent story it is.

It is obvious that King Squash of Toadyland is a satire upon British high and low life; but that is the only thing that is obvious about it. Some of the characters, such as Mr. Ashbin Tartlet, Lord Handoff Kirkdale, Mr. Henry Taunton (who lives at Rape's Look and belongs to the Gridiron Club), and Mr. Gustavus Camera are, it is only too plain, intended to be portraits of living personages of more or less note; and some are executed cleverly and not too ill-naturedly. That portion of the book which lays bare our social sores, like the chapter on "The Town of Gin," is genuinely, though not unduly, realistic; and the whole of it is carefully written. At the same time, the author would be well advised not to attempt to follow the example of Alexandre Dumas père and "write up" a revolution—even a revolution to place in power "the Prince and Princess of Gyrru Fad." He can tell a love story more than fairly, however. The Envoy Extraordinary's courtship of Lady Leonora is, in spite of the wild improbability attending her husband's death, far and away the best thing in King Squash of Toadyland.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

CURRENT THEOLOGY.

"THE EXPOSITOR'S BIBLE."—The Prophecies of Jeremiah, with a Sketch of his Life and Times. By the Rev. C. J. Ball. (Hodder & Stoughton.) There is a passage of Herder in which that true lover of the Bible contrasts the Modpredigten of his day with the heartfelt and heart-stirring discourses of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The contrast between modern sermons and ancient prophecies may be less needed now; but it is well for "The Expositor's Bible" to recall attention to these great pastor-prophets (see Jer. xvii. 16), whose works are so little studied because so little understood. There is in Mr. Ball less of that rich faculty of application which enabled Mr. G. A. Smith, without wronging the primary sense, to show strangely modern aspects of the teaching of Isaiah. His style is less easy; the critical and the popular elements are less completely fused in his exposition. But his scholarship is not inferior, and though he has not spoken out as frankly as could be wished, his sympathy with progressive study is, we venture to hope, not less genuine. Vigorous new translations from the Hebrew are more prominent in the present volume than they were in the Isaiah, nor does Mr. Ball feel bound either to the Authorised Version or to the Massoretic text. It is a still greater novelty that he designates the God of Israel, not as "the Lord," nor yet as "Jehovah," but as "Iahvah." How many scholars, we wonder, will endorse this pronunciation? It was time that some change should be made. But if Jehovah is to be abandoned—familiar as it is to the English reader—it is desirable that teachers should agree on the substitute to be adopted. Many excellent points might be mentioned both in the translation and in the exegesis. How vivid is the explanation of "lodging-place" (Jer. ix. 2, p. 188)! How delicate the tact in the rendering "my Lord Iahvah" (Jer. i. 6, p. 69)! How true the sympathy with the prayers of the much-tried prophet (p. 313, cf. p. 42)! And though Mr. Ball hesitates to carry his readers very far into Biblical theology (hence a poor explanation of Jer. xvii. 12, 13), yet what an excellent hint is that on p. 32, and how well he describes the "immortal spirit" of the Bible on pp. 177-179! Must we intermix some regretful censure with these justly appreciative words? The author will hardly be surprised if we do. He isolates himself too much from other students. Not only does he put forward his private opinions with a confidence which is hardly justified (e.g., on the name "Iahvah" and on Hebrew metre), but he gives an impression of wishing to prepossess orthodox readers in his favour by somewhat too eager criticisms of men who have "borne the burden and heat" of the struggle for that very view of the Old Testament which he himself in essentials apparently holds. Take, for instance, Mr. Ball's treatment of Hitzig—the most acute of modern commentators on Jeremiah—in chap. i., and of Kuenen, on p. 368! It is not right that he should quote from the latter without giving either the reference or the date of the book. The Godsdienst van Israel—a masterpiece of critical construction—was published in 1869-1870. Its learned and modest author has doubtless criticised his own work long since, and modified many details. Mr. Ball's own account of the history of the Jewish Sabbath is itself not in all points satisfactory. He lets the reader imagine that the notion of the Sabbath was much the same from the time of Moses to that of Ezra and Nehemiah. Or take his treatment of another work, to blame which is in some quarters a certificate of orthodoxy—the Encyclopaedia Britannica. How eager he is to set the author of the article on Jeremiah right! How prominently he contrasts the "exaggerations" and "misleading statements" of this least startling of all the critical articles in the Encyclopaedia with the moderate and judicious views which he leads us to expect from himself (pp. 4-6)! Want of historic imagination and defective sympathy are indeed serious faults; but more proof ought to have been given, especially by one who needs so much indulgence himself. The author returns to the charge (without indeed giving a reference) at p. 33. Apparently he does not quite realise the difficulty which the theory criticised was designed to meet. But certainly he has taken no pains to enquire whether the theory had been at all modified since the year 1881. Had he referred to this "well-known writer's" study on The Life and Times of Jeremiah, published nearly two years since, he would have found at p. 146 that Baruch may be supposed to have read, not only the prophecy contained in Jer. xxv., but "the most relevant of Jeremiah's prophecies, especially that very important one (chap. xxv.) written in the fatal year of Carchemish, and containing a new and definite announcement of most serious import." It is not pleasing to have to mention this lack of generosity in the author of so useful a book. But it stares the reviewer in the face, and is not a desirable precedent for future writers in "The Expositor's Bible."

The Prophecies of Jeremiah. By C. von Orelli. Translated by Rev. J. S. Banks. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.) This is really the second part of a commentary (published in 1887) on the two first of the "greater" prophets. English print takes up so much more room than German that the translation is nearly twice as bulky as the original. This is to be regretted, as the work was projected in the interests of a not very wealthy class. It would, perhaps, have been better to omit the translation of Orelli's version of the prophets, which, neither from a literary nor from a critical point of view, is of much importance. The commentary is in the same style as that which we noticed not long since on Isaiah. It represents a criticism well adapted to the transitional stage in which most English students are. Jeremiah's authorship of chap. x. 1-16 is defended, but with a hesitation which does credit to the writer's candour; and, though more positiveness is shown in claiming chaps. i. and li. for the prophet, the grounds on which a large school of critics reject the claim are set forth with reasonable fulness. Chap. lii. is, of course, given up to the spoiler. It is an appendix "written neither by Jeremiah, nor for Jeremiah's book," and "was borrowed from a historical work." Chap. xxv. 13 b is a marginal gloss which has strayed into the text in a wrong place; it was meant as a heading to xxv. 15, &c. Chaps. xxxix. 1, 2, 4-10, are also an interpolation derived from the same source as chap. lii. The exegesis is well up to the level of ordinary students. There is no depth, much less subtlety, in tracing the prophet's thought, or in showing the relation of his ideas to the course of religious development. But common-sense there is; and if the student can be induced by Orelli's example to apply the same inestimable faculty to his author, only with more use of the comparative method, and, perhaps, less timidity, we shall have cause enough to be grateful to the accomplished translator of this work.

The Servant of the Lord in Isaiah XL.-LXVI., reclaimed to Isaiah as the Author from Argument, Structure, and Date. By John Forbes. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.) The tone of this volume is worthy of one who has lived and worked to such an advanced age. The attempt to show a symmetrical arrangement of Isaiah xl.-xliv., and of other sections of the Book of Isaiah, by the correspondence of catchwords (a principle already applied by Delitzsch, and on a large scale by Cornill) deserves attention. The rest of the book gives evidence of a vigorous individuality, but is fundamentally uncritical. A paper reprinted from a theological review is added as an appendix, relating to Isaiah's great prophecy of "Immanuel." The very thorough indices deserve commendation.

Biblical Commentary on the Psalms. By Franz Delitzsch. Translated by the Rev. David Eaton. Vol. iii. (Hodder & Stoughton.) This excellent translation of an invaluable work is now complete. How greatly it contrasts with the English version previously in circulation has already been said. It is not easy to translate Delitzsch. Not only knowledge of English and German, but some Hebrew scholarship and acquaintance with the bibliography of the subject, are necessary safeguards to the translator. It is hardly worth while to cavil over this or that word in which the exact shade of meaning may not have been seized; as a whole, the book thoroughly satisfies the just claims of the student. Wetstein's belated contribution on "the mountain of Bashan" (Ps. lxxviii. 16, 17) is a welcome addition to this volume. The errata must be very few; but can "Cordilleries" (p. 460) be correct?

David in the Psalms: with various Notes on the Psalter. By the Rev. F. W. Mozley. (Bell.) This book is somewhat in the style of Dr. Forbes's Studies in the Book of Psalms, noticed in the ACADEMY of April 14, 1888, but the work of a younger and less scholarly author. Mr. Mozley admits that he has no "available knowledge of Hebrew"; and though he has used one or two German as well as some English commentaries on the Psalms, it is but too patent that he has not read a single book of the Old Testament on modern exegetical principles. Had he once mastered even the Book of Isaiah, he could not have written so uncritically. The redeeming features in the volume are the attempt to consider the Psalms in groups, and the attention paid to the titles of the Psalms in the Septuagint. The remark is made that the theory of the Davidic authorship of the whole Psalter had no influence on the Septuagint titles. But will it be contended that there was not a growing tendency subsequent to the first "Davidic" collection to ascribe psalms to the traditional founder of psalmody? It is pleasing to add, however, that Mr. Mozley does not ascribe Ps. cxxxvii. to David himself, but adopts the view (in which there is a spice of criticism) that it was prefixed to a "Davidic" collection consisting of Pss. cxxxviii.-cxlvi. Mr. Mozley does not seem acquainted with the famous passage in the Babylonian Talmud (Baba Bathra, 14b). With an adequate training he might do better things, at least if he could put on one side his strong theological prepossessions (see on Ps. cx.). Among the novelties of this book we notice that Ps. xlix. is "a funeral psalm, suggested by the recent death of David."

The Psalms in Greek according to the Septuagint. Edited for the Syndics of the University Press. By Henry Barclay Swete. (Cambridge: University Press.) A separate issue of the text and critical apparatus of the Psalter will be acceptable to many academical students. The second volume to which it belongs has not yet appeared. The friendly help of Dr. E. Nestlé, of Ulm, has greatly contributed to the accuracy of the critical notes.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE has finished his winter's work in the Fayum, and is now staying at Jerusalem, preparing for his excavations on a Canaanite and Israelite town near Gaza, on behalf of the Palestine Exploration Fund.

MISS AMELIA B. EDWARDS is now on her way home, having sailed from New York on Saturday last, March 29, in the Etruria. She did not allow her accident to interfere with either business or pleasure. On Tuesday, March 22, she was the guest of Sorosis—which we take to be the lady's club of New York—who celebrated their twenty-second anniversary by a luncheon at Delmonico's. On the same evening she gave an address to the Nineteenth Century Club on "The Romantic Fiction of the Early Egyptians," when her views on the Egyptian origin of certain folk-tales were contested by Prof. Daniel Brinton, of Philadelphia, and Prof. T. F. Crane, of Cornell.

THE Committee of the Beatrice Celebration in Florence during May and June (see ACADEMY, January 11) have carried out a happy idea in inviting the poets of Europe to contribute a sonnet of homage to Beatrice, the autographs of which will be framed and hung in perpetuity in the new Sala Dantea now being added to the Biblioteca Nazionale for the purpose of commemorating the festival and enshrining all that is best in the Beatrice Exhibition. Miss R. H. Busk—who undertook to canvas the poets of England—has already received contributions from Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Lewis Morris, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Theodore Watts, showing that Beatrice has not ceased to be an "inspiratrice." Lord Tennyson's state of health, unfortunately, precludes him from leading this poetic chorus; but it is hoped he will at least be able to send an autograph line to be hung with these poems expressing the very valid reason of his "gran rifiuto." Miss Busk has also received for transmission to Florence photographs from Miss Rossetti of her brother's paintings and drawings of Beatrice; and from Mr. John Addington Symonds the promise of a copy of the forthcoming new edition of his work on the study of Dante.

MANY readers of the ACADEMY will be glad to know that a committee has been formed to take steps towards erecting a memorial to the late Rev. Dr. R. F. Littledale. It is suggested that the memorial should take the form of a reredos in the chapel of St. Katharine's, Queen's-square, W.C., where he ministered daily for the last twenty years of his life; and it is further proposed to endow a cot in St. Margaret's Orphanage, East Grinstead, to bear his name. Subscriptions may be sent to the hon. treasurer, Mr. Octavius Leefe, 1 Quality-court, Chancery-lane.

A NEW quarterly, of a novel character, is announced for publication on May 1 by Messrs. George Routledge & Sons, who have hitherto been one of the very few leading publishers without a magazine of their own. It is to be called Subjects of the Day; and its special plan is to deal systematically with important subjects of the day, in a series of articles written by experts, together with a general summary, reviews of books, and a bibliography. For example, the first number will have for its subject "State Education for the People"; and among the contributors will be Sir William Hunter, Sir Philip Magnus, the Rev. E. F. M. MacCarthy, of Birmingham, Mr. Edward M. Hance, of Liverpool, and Mrs. Emily Crawford. The editor is Mr. James Samuelson, author of works of travel in Roumania, India, &c.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN'S novel, entitled When we were Boys, will be published by Messrs. Longmans, in one volume, on April 21.

MR. GEORGE ALLEN has in the press a posthumous volume of poems by Charles Mackay, with an introduction by his son, Mr. Eric Mackay.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL will publish in the course of the present month Dr. Juncker's Travels in Africa, translated from the German by Prof. A. H. Keane. The volume will be illustrated with thirty-eight full-page plates and numerous woodcuts in the text, as well as with maps.

MESSRS. TRUSLOVE & SHIRLEY have in the press a History of the two parishes of Bloomsbury and St. Giles's, by Mr. George Clinch, of the British Museum, whose name is a guarantee that antiquarian and literary anecdotes will not be neglected. The work will be illustrated with twenty-four full-page plates, reproduced from rare originals by the photomezzotype process.

MESSRS. METHUEN & Co. will shortly commence the issue of a series of copyright novels—each published in a single volume and at a low price—under the title of "Methuen's Novel Stories." The first will be a new work by Mr. Baring Gould, entitled Zael, and this will be followed by Mrs. Leith Adams's My Land of Beulah. Novels by Edna Lyall, Miss F. Mabel Robinson, Mr. G. Manville Fenn, L. T. Meade, and other well-known writers, will appear in due course.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. will shortly publish Blindfold, by Florence Marryat, and A New Othello, by Iza Duffus Hardy, each in three volumes; and The Confessions of a Doormat, by Alfred C. Calmour, and The Mystery of a Woman's Heart, by Mrs. Edward Kennard, each in one volume.

THE new volume of "The Book Lovers' Library," to be issued very shortly, will be Newspaper Reporting in Olden Time and To-day, written by Mr. John Pendleton, author of "The History of Derbyshire."

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & Co. are adding to their "Social Science Series" volumes on Crime and the Prison System, by Mr. W. Douglas Morrison, of the Wandsworth gaol; and Charity Organisation, by Mr. C. S. Lock, Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society.

WE understand that, in accordance with the promise recently made by Mr. Raikes in the House of Commons that public attention should be again called to the advantages of government insurance, the General Post Office is about to issue, in leaflet form, Mr. A. G. Bowie's article on "Post Office Insurance and Old Age Pay," which recently appeared in A I.

MR. W. MARWICK, secretary of the Ruskin Reading Guild and editor of Igdrasil, will give a lecture to the London Ruskin Society, at the London Institution, on Friday next, April 11, at 8 p.m., on "Kings' Treasures: their Use and Abuse."

MR. DAVID NUTT, almost all of whose publications belong to that special class that are really worth the buying, has just issued a reprint of Lyrical Ballads (1798), edited by Prof. Edward Dowden. This little book—whether we consider the actual circumstances of its production, the value of some at least of its contents, or its place in the history of literature—might be expected to be one of the most sought after of all first editions. Yet we find, from Book-Prices Current, that a well-known collector was able to purchase a copy in April 1887 for £2 6s. To those who cannot afford even so much as that, the present reprint will satisfy all reasonable desires; for the typography simulates that of the original. Here may be seen the fruits of the memorable companionship of Coleridge and Wordsworth during their Nether Stowey days; and "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner" may be read in its primitive spelling. Prof. Dowden has limited himself to a brief preface and a minimum of notes, which may be thought rather inadequate by those who are not already versed in the bibliography of the subject.

WE must be content with recording that Days and Hours in a Garden, by E. V. B. (Elliot Stock), has reached a seventh edition within about as many years from the date of its first publication. Nothing new has been added to either text or illustrations, except a preface commemorating the changes that time has wrought in the garden which is the subject of these charming and now familiar pages.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces a series of University Extension Manuals, under the editorship of Prof. Knight, of St. Andrew's. Though designed primarily for the use of students attending the authorised courses of lectures, it is hoped that they will also serve as text-books for private study. The general plan will be to keep in view the historical evolution and philosophical significance of each subject, while avoiding the enumeration of mere details. The following are some of the arrangements that have already been made: Mr. M. E. Sadler, the Oxford Secretary, will write on Political Economy; Dr. Roberts, the Cambridge (and now also the London) secretary, on Modern Geology; and Prof. James Stuart, the founder of the movement, on Mechanics. In English literature, Mr. Edmund Gosse has undertaken the Jacobean poets, and the Rev. Stopford Brooke the poets of the nineteenth century, from Blake to Tennyson. The editor himself will be responsible for Ethics and The Philosophy of the Beautiful; and most of the other philosophical and scientific subjects have also been assigned to Scotch professors—Logic, to Prof. Minto; Psychology, to Prof. Seth; Comparative Religion, to Prof. Menzies; The History of Education, to Prof. Laurie; Physiology, to Prof. McKendrick; and Botany, to Prof. Patrick Geddes. The manuals will be issued simultaneously in England and America.

THE Queen has accepted the dedication of The Life and Letters of Adam Sedgwick, by Mr. J. Willis Clark and Prof. T. M. K. Hughes, which will shortly be published by the Cambridge Press, in two volumes.

THE residuary legatees of the late Daniel Procter, recognising the importance of pathological studies and the desirability of securing the fullest facilities for their prosecution by the students of the Manchester medical school, have decided to contribute the sum of £6,000 for the endowment of the pathological professorship at Owen's College, which will henceforth be associated with Mr. Procter's name.

THE Durham University Journal for March 29 prints an interesting notice of the late Edward Bradley, better known as "Cuthbert Bede," together with a provisional list of his publications. The first appearance of Verdant Green was in a supplement to the Illustrated London News for December 13, 1851, consisting of twelve of the illustrations to the first four chapters, with a few lines of descriptive letter-press to each. Part I. appeared in 1853, Part II. in 1854, Part III. a year or two later; and afterwards the three parts were collected into a volume, of which (it may be recollected) a six-penny edition was published a few years ago. All the illustrations were designed and drawn on the wood by the author. Little Mr. Bouncer and His Friend, Verdant Green—which we believe to be a sequel, and even less successful than most sequels—was published in 1878; and there were also two intermediate books, Tales of College Life (1866) and College Life (1862).

THE commemoration address on the fifteenth anniversary of the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, was delivered by Dr. E. H. Griffin, professor of philosophy, who took for his subject "The Influence of Learned Institutions upon the Progress of Modern Society." It was announced that the first course of lectures on poetry on the Turnbull foundation will be given in the spring of 1891 by Mr. Edmund Clarence Stedman; and that the Caroline Donovan endowment will probably be devoted to a chair of English literature.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY has recently received a gift of 300,000 dollars (£60,000) to form an endowment for its library. The donor is Mr. Henry W. Sage, of Ithaca, New York, whose total benefactions to Cornell now amount to about one million dollars.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE VENUS OF MILO.

"Dinanzi a noi pareva sì verace,

Che non sembrava immagine che tace."—Pwv.

Goddess of Beauty!—goddess still, though Time
Hath ruthlessly defaced thee—what rare art
Was his who fashioned thee? Thou stand'st apart

From all thy kind, most perfect, most sublime.
Thy beauty wastes not, nay, for never crime, Nor hate, nor passion hast thou known, nor smart

Of cankering grief, nor pain, nor aching heart—
Thy brow is smooth to-day as in thy prime.
Thou standest yet, but where is he who planned
The fashion of thy limbs, and wrought the stone
With ever-patient skill and loving hand,
And left thee faultless, lacking life alone?
World-famous thou, by eager thousands scanned,
While he, forgotten, lies with the unknown!

OBITUARY.

EDWARD HAILSTONE.

THE death is announced of Mr. Edward Hailstone, of Walton Hall, Yorkshire, at the age of seventy-two years.

Mr. Hailstone was formerly a solicitor in Bradford, and succeeded his father as law clerk to the Leeds and Liverpool Canal, which position he held for over forty years. In literary and antiquarian circles he would be best known for his extensive collection of literary, artistic, and antique treasures—probably the finest in the North of England. Mr. Hailstone was a leading member of the Yorkshire Archaeological Society, a member of the National Archaeological Society, of the Athenaeum Club, and a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries. He had the honour of receiving a medal and diploma, the latter signed by Prince Albert, for services rendered in connexion with the Great Hyde Park Exhibition of 1851.

We understand that the deceased gentleman's famous collection of Yorkshire books, &c., has been bequeathed by him to the Dean and Chapter of York, to be preserved in the Minster Library, and that the rest of his library and works of art will be sold.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Boletín of the Royal Academy of History of Madrid for March gives a further instalment of inedited documents relating to the Cortés of Madrid, 1646-7 and 1649-51, by Manuel Danvila. The difficulty of raising money speedily for pressing wants was very great, and king and Cortés are sorely puzzled which of several proposed expedients to employ. F. de Selgas has an excellent monograph on the early Basilica of Santa Maria in Oviedo (793-812), and its royal pantheon. He shows that the original plan was that of a Latin Basilica, with no Byzantine influence. The only artistic ornaments came from still older buildings, Visigothic and Roman. A description of the tombs, their inscriptions, and identification of almost all their occupants, follow. The Viscount de Palazuelos reports on a Roman inscription from Orgaz, in the province of Toledo. Padre F. Fita prints a curious Brief of Innocent VIII. to Ferdinand and Isabella, 1487, begging for the arrest and imprisonment of Pico de la Mirandula, who was then in Spain.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHAUCER'S STORY OF "THE MAD COW."

Cambridge: April 2, 1890.

If there is in Chaucer one crux which has been considered of all the most hopeless, I should say it is the reference in the Wife of Bath's Prologue, l. 231.

"A wys wyf, if that she kan hir good, Shal bere hym on hond, the Cow is wood."

So says the Ellesmere MS. Tywhitt remarks that we shall never know the sense till we discover the allusion.

Dr. Murray has, practically, solved the hardest part of the riddle. In the New English Dictionary, s.v., "Chough," he shows that the various readings, cow, cove, &c., tend to prove that "cow" in this passage does not mean a cow, but a jackdaw or chough. Cf. "Coo, monedula" in the Promptorium.

Hence the sense is as follows: "A cunning wife, if she knows how to make the best of things, will make her husband believe that the jackdaw is mad."

But this is just one of the commonest of mediaeval stories, being told of various talking birds, originally of a parrot. See the "Story of the Husband and the Parrot" in the "Arabian Nights;" the story at p. 73 of "The Seven Sages," ed. Wright; and Wright's remarks in his preface, p. x.

Very briefly the story runs thus. A husband, leaving his wife, sets his parrot to watch her. On his return, the parrot relates her misconduct. But the wife says the parrot lies, and tries to prove it by an ingenious stratagem. The husband believes his wife's deceitful plot, and promptly wrings the bird's neck for telling stories, under the impression that it has gone mad.

That Chaucer knew this story is proved by the fact that he used up some of the details in his Manciple's Tale.

WALTER W. SKELT.

SLAVONIC PLACE-NAMES IN GERMANY.

Oxford: March 27, 1890.

In Mr. Morfill's inaugural lecture as Slavonic Reader at Oxford, noticed in the ACADEMY of March 22, a few German towns are cited as instances of ancient Wendish or Slavic settlements, the names of which are entirely foreign to German, and can be interpreted only by means of the Slavonic languages.

It may be, perhaps, not unwelcome to some readers of the ACADEMY, if space will be granted to trace, as briefly as possible, the Slavonic source of those local names, and, at the same time, to add a few further examples. Besides personal information from Mr. Morfill, I am indebted to an elaborate monograph by A. Buttmann, Die Deutschen und Wendischen Ortsnamen der Mittelmark und Niederlausitz (183 pages, Berlin, 1856), as well as to the chief authority of Sáfari's Slavonic Antiquities, referred to in my note on "Early Contact between Celts and Slavs" (ACADEMY, March 15).

1. Rostock, derived from Russian ras-tekut or ras-teč, "to run or flow into different directions," which meaning precisely agrees with the topographical position of Rostock not far from the mouth of the river Warnow, and may be compared with Aber-ystwyth and its meaning in Welsh.

2. Schwerin, from svēr, "a wild animal," applied to a park where wild animals are kept.

3. Strelitz, from strélets, "an archer, hunter," the neighbourhood of this town and of Schwerin being a famous hunting-ground.

4. Leipzig, from Lipovitsa, i.e. Linden or lime-tree town.

5. Dresden = Wendish Droždzeje, a "harbour or anchorage."

6. Potsdam = Pod Dubami, i.e. "beneath the oak trees." Its earliest known name in 993 was "Postupimi."

7. Berlin = Wendish Barlin, i.e. "a shelter, place of refuge," though this derivation is not quite certain; for, according to Malin (Etymologische Untersuchungen, Berlin, 1856, p. 75), it is probably of Celtic origin, and denotes a pasture-ground or heath-bush, a covert. For the Wendish derivation see Zwahr's Niederlausitz - Wendisch - Deutsches Handwörterbuch (Spremberg, 1847, p. 6).

8. Jüterbogk = Polish jutro, Russian utro "morning," Bog, "god," hence the god of the morning dawn.

9. Zerbst = Ostervisti, its earliest name according to a document of the German emperor Otto I., dated 949. It was so called after the first Sorbian inhabitants of the place, Srbs, Sorbs, or Serbs being the original native name of the Slavs among themselves, whereas their common foreign appellation was Wends or Winds, as Šáfarik has conclusively shown (op. cit. i., p. 165).

Gratz = borough, town, being identical with Gard in Stargard, i.e. old town, or Germanised, Oldenburg. Compare also Novgorod, i.e. "new town."

H. KREBS.

THE ORIGINAL OF LEIÇARRAGA'S BASQUE NEW TESTAMENT.

Paris.

On January 13, 1890, I discovered what has, I believe, never been stated in print—that Leiçarraga's New Testament (La Rochelle: 1671), including the appendices, was based on a French version (No. A, 169) in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, entitled:

"Le Nouveau Testament, c'est à dire, La nouvelle alliance de nostre Seigneur, et seul Sauveur Iesus Christ. Translate de Grec en François. Imprime [sic] par Conrad Badius M.D.LXI."

M. J. Vinson informed me that Leiçarraga had used a text authorised by "Les Pasteurs et les Docteurs de l'Eglise de Genève," of which an edition came out at La Rochelle in 1616; but, after a careful examination, I found this to be quite impossible; whereas the other text served as a very much more literal translation, and thus forms an authoritative glossary to a large number of words in the Basque language, the earliest known use, and in some cases the only occurrence, of which is due to Leiçarraga. Philologists would all welcome a reprint of the Basque text, accompanied by that of Badius, which it translates, page facing page.

In proof of my conclusion, I will cite two sentences from the appendices:

"Propitiatoire en la Loy estoit la couverture de l'arche, cachée des ailes des deux cherubins."

"Propitiatorioa, Leguean cen bi Oherubinen hegalez estalia cen arkaren baldia."

The word Baldia = "la couverture," is not found in the printed dictionaries. All are incomplete. "Adam, homme, ou de terre, ou Rousseau" = "Adam, guicóna, edolurrezcoo, edo canabará."

The French version in question is anonymous as to the translator, and without date as to place—so far as regards the title-page. But there is an address within, stating clearly that it is a revision of Calvin's (printed by the same Conrad Badius at Basle in 1559), made by Calvin himself and Theodore de Beza.

EDWARD SPENCER DODGSON.

E. D. GERARD AND DOROTHEA GERARD.

Edinburgh: March 31, 1890.

Will you allow me to correct an inaccuracy in the review of Lady Baby by Dorothea Gerard, which appeared in the ACADEMY for March 29? Your reviewer says:

"It is, unfortunately, human nature to imagine that when, after two authors have written together, one of them writes alone, there is sure to be some sign of inferiority. We humbly hope that much practice in criticism has given us some faculty of guarding against prejudices of this kind; and we have approached Lady Baby with all due exorcising of such demons, and with nothing but a benevolent memory of satisfaction derived from Reata and Orthodox."

Reata, Beggar my Neighbour, and The Waters of Hercules were written by both sisters, under their joint name of E. D. Gerard; but Orthodox, like Lady Baby, was the work of Dorothea Gerard alone.

SCIENCE.

THE MEDIAEVAL ZOROASTRIAN RELIGION.

The Philosophy of the Mazdayasnian Religion under the Sassanids. Translated from the French of L. O. Casartelli by Firoz Jamsajji Dastur Jamsajji Asa. (Bombay: Jehangir Bejanji Karani.)

A MELANCHOLY interest attaches itself to this book, owing to the early and sudden death of the translator, the only son of his father, the learned Dastur Dr. Jamsajji Minocherji, whose liberality in lending his own valuable MSS., and whose exertions in obtaining the loan of those belonging to others, have so materially assisted the compilation of the new edition of the Avesta Texts. About fifteen years ago I had many opportunities of conversing with the translator. He was then a young man, well acquainted with English and the simpler branches of his religious education, but still requiring further study of the more difficult Pahlavi texts. His perfect respect for his father, and complete obedience, though merely the ordinary duties of a high priest's son, were particularly pleasing in these days of insubordination, when rapidly advancing education is too apt to produce self-conceit and arrogance. His French studies were of later date; but the general accuracy of this translation shows that he had acquired a very complete knowledge of that language.

The work itself is a very useful and well-arranged compendium of the philosophical and religious doctrines of the mediaeval Zoroastrians, giving an account of their good and evil spirits, cosmology, ethics, and eschatology, derived chiefly from the Bundahish, but with many additions from other Pahlavi writings of the same or later date, including quotations from the third book of the Dinkard. Unfortunately, the statements of later writers, and of foreigners and enemies of the faith, are sometimes adopted as if they were of equal authority with those of contemporary and native writers, who must have been better acquainted with the facts. The translator's notes frequently protest against the conclusions of the author, and, in most instances, with considerable justice. This is especially the case when the author tries to trace the monotheism and other praiseworthy doctrines of the Mazdayasians to Jewish or Christian influence, forgetful of all that might be said on the other side of the question. My friend Dr. Casartelli also objects strongly to some of my own statements and translations; but, if he will carefully re-examine my writings and the original Pahlavi texts, I venture to think that he will find far less reason for positive objection than he imagines. For instance, I never placed the Avesta and Pahlavi writings on the same footing as to age, but distinctly attributed the latter to "later Persian priestcraft." Of course, we must agree to differ with regard to the era of Zarathushtra, who is still so far a prehistoric personage that nothing but the most inconsistent and mythical statements regarding his epoch and life have yet been discovered—statements on which not the slightest reliance can be placed.

R. W. WEST.

TWO BOOKS ON VACCINATION.

History and Pathology of Vaccination. By R. M. Crookshank. (Lewis.)

Jenner and Vaccination: a Strange Chapter of Medical History. By Charles Creighton. (Sonnenschein.)

WE have here two independent protests against the theory and practice of vaccination, made by two medical men of special eminence and official weight in pathology. Dr. Creighton's work is addressed to the general public. It is, like all he writes, clear and incisive, and also uncompromising even to provocation. Dr. Crookshank's two handsome and elaborately illustrated volumes appeal more particularly to the members of his own profession, as a critical and historical inquiry into the origin, growth, and present position of vaccination. It is enough to say here that the inquiry has been conducted with industry and candour, in the spirit of a dispassionate searcher after truth, who desires to conciliate and persuade, and who deserves respectful attention and reply. The evidence of statistics is claimed, rather than produced, in favour of their conclusions, and some glaring instances are quoted of the failure of vaccination to protect against smallpox; but, in view, we suppose, of the shameful double-dealing of figures, most stress is laid upon the appeal to history and pathology. In so far as the question is one for historical and pathological inquiry—and surely it must be so to a high degree—it might be urged fairly enough that the deliberate and formulated opinion of the vast majority of the medical profession ought to outweigh the protests of a very very small minority, and that the general public in any case is not a proper court of appeal to decide where doctors disagree. As a matter of fact, however, it is open to reply that the bulk of the medical profession are in this matter as ignorant and incurious as the bulk of the laity. They and the inquisitive public are told by medical and legal authority to believe in vaccination as part of a theory based upon analogies; some rough, but striking, statistics and illustrations are quoted in support of this particular application of the theory; they see much of vaccination, whose immediate effects are usually harmless; they see next to nothing of smallpox, which is known to have been the scourge and disfigurement of past generations; and this joyful coincidence seems a sufficient verification of authoritative teaching. The public cannot, perhaps, be expected to require more stringent proof of the theory and efficacy of vaccination; but that the medical profession should not be more exacting seems strange to some, to others culpable. It is neither; but merely a natural result of the exaggerated deference paid in medical education to the principle of authority. That education, in many respects excellent, makes huge demands upon the powers of memory and observation, encourages shrewdness, resource, and a wonderful assurance and agility in arguing from small premises to large conclusions; but too often where it is not empirical it is dogmatic, it assumes principles and gives no reasons. At no medical school are lectures given upon the history of medicine as an inductive science, upon its logic and axioms and methods, its fashions and prejudices and errors. But medical education is too vast a subject for a note or a digression. The movement against vaccination may or may not be irrational, and in contempt of facts; but at least let the medical profession be sure of its ground, and not rest content with the theological treatment of a scientific question.

SCIENCE NOTES.

It is proposed to issue, as a supplement to Thompson's Natural History of Ireland, the information that has subsequently been accumulated concerning Irish birds, mainly in reply to an announcement that appeared in the Zoologist for 1884. The editor of the work is Mr. R. J. Ussher, Cappagh, Lismore—who will be glad to receive any additional notes; and it will be published in this country by Messrs. Gurney & Jackson, Mr. Van Voorst's successors.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE forthcoming number of the Babylonian and Oriental Record will contain the following articles: "The Nation of the Mards," by M. J. Halevy; "The Assyrian Sacred Trees," by Mr. W. St. Chad Boscawen; "Did the Assyrians know the Sexes of Date-Palms?" by Dr. J. Bonavia; "Traditions of the Deluge in Ancient Chinese Lore," by Prof. Terrien de Lacouperie.

It is difficult to keep pace with the publications of Dr. Daniel G. Brinton, whose prolificness is equalled only by his audacity of speculation. Quite recently we noticed (ACADEMY, December 7 and March 15) two papers of his in which he sought to connect the ancient Etruscans with the Libyans. He has now sent us—in addition to a solid volume entitled Essays of an Americanist (Philadelphia: Porter & Coates)—another paper read by him before the Philadelphia Oriental Club, on "The Cradle of the Semites," together with a reply by Dr. Morris Jastrow, Junior. Dr. Brinton, it may be as well to remember, has lately paid a visit to Algeria, where he was evidently much interested in the researches of French savants as to the language and ethnology of the Kabyles. He now goes so far as to maintain that not only the Etruscans, but also the primitive Semites, were immigrants, along the African shore of the Mediterranean, from some region near its western extremity. Dr. Jastrow contested some of his philological arguments, but admitted the weight to be attached to the traces of a white race found in Palestine. But it by no means seems to follow that this white race, which other anthropologists (notably Prof. Sayce) have connected with the Libyans, was necessarily the primitive Semitic stock. The evidence of language certainly seems to connect the Semites with the Hamitic stock of the lower Nile valley.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Thursday, March 6.)

DR. SANDYS, president, in the chair.—Mr. Darbishire read a paper on ἐπιδέξιος and Hdt. ii. 38—γράμματα γράφουσι καὶ λογίζονται ψήφοις; "Ἕλληνες μὲν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀριστερῶν ἐπὶ τὰ δεξιὰ φέροντες τὴν χεῖρα, Αἰγύπτιοι δὲ ἀπὸ τῶν δεξιῶν ἐπὶ τὰ ἀριστερά· καὶ ταῦτα ποιῶντες αὐτοὶ μὲν φασὶ ἐπιδέξια ποιεῖν," Ἕλληνας δὲ ἐπ' ἀριστερά. The most common explanation, which makes ἐπιδέξια = "skilfully," is not consistent with the lateness of this sense—once in Aeschines (iii. [In Timarch.] 178), three times in Aristotle (Eth. Nic. iv. 14, ix. 11, Rhet. ii. 4) &c., and does not give a satisfactory antithesis. Its usual sense in Homer is in connexion with the passing of the wine-cup, which went from left to right of the feasters, and not of the cup-bearer. Compare also Plato, Sympos. 177 D, where ἐπὶ δεξιὰ is explained as beginning with the extreme left-hand man. If now we wish to transfer the image to the case of a man writing, it is obvious that he represents the cup-bearer, his hand or pen represents the cup, and the row of letters the row of feasters. The letters then must be considered as having their own right and left, and ἐπιδέξια γράφειν will be "beginning at the writer's right" just as ἐπιδέξια οἰνοχοεῖν is "beginning at the cup-bearer's right." Thus the remark in the text is a play upon words attained by opposing the etymological sense of ἐπιδέξιος, "towards the right," to its derived one, which in certain connexions may be "towards the left." This interpretation is supported by the careful contrast of ἐπιδέξια with ἐπὶ τὰ δεξιὰ and of ἐπ' ἀριστερά with ἐπὶ τὰ ἀριστερά in the passage before us. Any difficulty which may be felt in regarding written characters as having their own right and left can be met by a passage from Aristotle (Metaph. N. 6, p. 1093^a 30), in which he says that the Homeric line (viz., the purely dactylic) βαλὺνται ἐν μὲν τῇ δεξιᾷ ἐντὶ αὐτὰ συλλαβαῖς, ἐν δὲ τῇ ἀριστερᾷ ὁκτώ, where the right half is obviously the first half, made up of three dactyls, and the left half the second, made up of two dactyls and a spondee. [This is the express explanation of the scholiast, twice repeated. Bonitz, who attempts to reverse the relations by dividing the line at the caesura, is compelled (a) to restrict the remark to lines with feminine caesura; (b) to make Aristotle commit a ὑπερτον πρότερον, as he thus states the second half and the larger number first.] But to call the first half of the line the right is only possible if the line is regarded as facing the reader and having a right and left hand of its own. Compare finally Aristotle, Probl. κς 31, p. 943^b 28, where the wind is credited with a subjective right and left. This, however, is more natural.—Dr. Postgate made some observations on the u-declension in Latin, criticising (inter alia) V. Henry's view that senatus was derived from senatūs, as the change of uo to uu was only established for Imperial times, and the truth being that senatus was only a mode of writing to show that the u in senatūs was long.

SHELLEY SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, March 12.)

W. M. ROSSWATT, Esq., in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. William Cory, on "Shelley's Classics," avowedly written from the standpoint of a classical scholar to whom "for nearly half his years of discretion Shelley has been a wearisome disappointing versifier, a writer with a very slender outfit of thought and very little art or skill." As the result of a recent study of Mr. Buxton Forman's edition, Mr. Cory was able to point out various errors in Shelley's Greek, "such as a schoolboy escapes from after two or three years of even the stupidest routine." As regards the poet's classical attainments, "he had a gentleman's acquaintance with the two languages and the two literatures, and would have got on pretty well in rivalry of display with Sam Rogers, Landor, Dean Herbert, Lord Grenville, Byron; not with Sir Robert Peel, Edward Earl Derby, Sir Francis Doyle, Macaulay, Hallam." It was Shelley's misfortune at Eton to be the pupil of the dullest tutor of his time; there is nothing to indicate that he attended any good classical lectures at the university; and it may be gathered from his letters that after leaving Oxford he never was near a good library or sojourned in the house of a cultivated travelled gentleman. The Greek authors with whom he was most conversant were Homer, Plato, Aeschylus, Euripides. It is to be regretted that he did not also become familiar with Herodotus, Sophocles, and Aristophanes. Of Virgil, Cicero, Horace, and the Latin writers in general, he seems to have known but little. He hated Latinity, because his tyrants drenched him with it. It is worthy of note, however, that the commencement of the famous chorus in "Hellas"—"the world's great age begins anew"—is derived from Virgil's "Magnus ab integro saeculorum nascitur ordo."—The reading of the paper was followed by a discussion.

NEW SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Friday, March 14.)

DR. F. J. FURNIVALL in the chair.—Mrs. C. Stopes read a paper on "Shakspeare's Treatment of his Originals." Shakspeare, on facing the writing of a play, had to do so under at least four laws or limitations, considering: (1) Its effect on the public (and the censor); (2) its relation to the acting powers of his own company; (3) the materials which he had to hand; and (4) the satisfaction of his own feeling and critical judgment. To these evidently at times must have been added a fifth—a "second intention"—such as is explained by Spenser in his opening of the allegory of his "Faery Queene," and of his meanings in the general and in the particular. There are evident traces of some such representation of contemporary men in Shakspeare's plays on ancient stories, just as in Greece traces reveal that in the past the white buildings were coloured—the playwright thus making "old offences of affections new." 1. Shakspeare had to labour against what may be called the sensationalism of his age, much as George Eliot has done in our own, by showing the interest in the character, apart from, as well as through, the plot. The blood, murder, and horrors necessary to give zest to a pre-Shakspearian tragedy drowned character and thought in a flood of action. Shakspeare only once followed the prevailing taste—in "Titus Andronicus"; afterwards he made the taste follow him, that was his genius. 2. The acting powers of his company must have varied much from time to time, and a history of the actors might sometimes give a suggestion of the date of a play. We know that successive editions of "Hamlet" age the hero according to Burbage's age. 3. Shakspeare, in considering his materials, drew a broad line between histories and other works, whether tragedy, comedy, narrative, or lyric. In depicting history, he attempted in the best possible way to depict the truth, and took trouble with his materials, so as not willingly to mislead his hearers. Yet, as an artist, he had to study the pictorial; and he foreshortened time, as an artist foreshortens objects—sc., in 1 and 2 "Henry IV." and "Henry V." His three Roman histories (from the authorities chiefly of Plutarch and Appian of Alexandria) were even more faithful in rendering, through his greater respect for classical authority. When not dealing with history, his fidelity to his original is less marked; if the original be a play, it depends very much upon whether it belonged to his own company or to another, and whether it had been lately or successfully played; if a novel, whether it adapted itself very readily to theatrical representation or not. The "Merchant of Venice" was an illustration of complexity of origin and commingling of material; while "Romeo and Juliet" showed simplicity of origin, with the text of it followed with comparative faithfulness. "Love's Labour Lost" and "Midsummer Night's Dream" were examples of plays in which Shakspeare wove the plot himself from small, or incongruous, material; while "Lear," "Cymbeline," "Hamlet," and "Macbeth" were examples of plays based upon old history, but treated as romance. Of these, "King Lear," while holding most nearly to the text, yet contains a foreshortening of history, necessitated by a dramatic climax. "Hamlet," though probably based somewhat upon the earlier tragedy of the name, existed in the German theatre; but there it was chiefly based upon the story of Amlethe the Dane in Belleforest's Histoires Tragiques, borrowed from Saxo. Shakspeare probably borrowed it from the French, in which there was a remark that these things happened before the faith of Christ. Shakspeare revolutionises the play, with the consequent revolution of faith and manners. The real Hamlet had the bravery, revenge, patience, and cunning of the savage; the Shaksperian Hamlet was a Hamlet to date—a Christian, scholar, philosopher, trained in all the accomplishments of his age. A counterpart, and yet contrast, to "Hamlet" is "Macbeth," from whom Shakspeare has taken away the Christianity he gave to Hamlet. Never was character so wronged by historian; never did Shakspeare wrong so much even the character he found in history; he gave Macbeth all the vices of all the sovereigns for eighty years before his time. It was as if he had created one of Galton's generic photographs, by superposing one photograph on another, to give the type-idea he had gathered from the chaotic seething of a troublous age.

MANCHESTER GOETHE SOCIETY.—(Thursday, March 15.)

DR. WARD, president, in the chair.—A letter from Baron Caspar Riesbeck, written in 1780, was communicated by Mr. Roeder. It describes a visit to the Weimar Court, and criticises Goethe and his followers from a conservative point of view.—The Rev. F. F. Cornish then read a paper on "Der junge Goethe," the title having reference to Hirzel's well-known collection of all Goethe's writings surviving from the period before he went to Weimar in 1776. Pointing out that the first edition of Lewes's "Life of Goethe" had come out just at the full tide of the first flow of biographical materials following the poet's death, he glanced at the additional matter which was increasing upon us from the opening of the Goethe archives, and urged that a Goethe society should aim at keeping students in fresh contact with the original sources. To this course was due the change which had come over opinion respecting Frau von Stein, and the light which was being shed upon Goethe's domestic life with Christiane. In answer to the question: Why did not Goethe marry before he came to Weimar? Mr. Cornish reviewed his Leipzig life in connexion with newly-recovered letters, and pointed out that the illness which nearly killed Goethe at the end of these three years was attributed by him to a short outbreak of fast life under the influence of Behrlich. Following this up, he traced the evidence that Goethe had been profoundly influenced by this illness, which had been a real turning point in his life; and he pointed out in a letter to the same friend dated Nov. 7, 1767, the occurrence, in an imaginative form, of the first germ of the Faust-Margaret scenes, with several curious coincidences of language and thought. Passing on to the Sessenheim Idyll, Mr. Cornish urged that we must go back from Dichtung und Wahrheit to the contemporary sources in order to see how Goethe behaved at the time, and found evidence that he had been deeply ashamed of himself, had kept the whole matter as secret as possible, and had probably done so very much under the fear of his father's displeasure. Eight years later he paid a visit to the Brion family, and after a friendly reception felt that he could now "feel his conscience at ease about these reconciled ones." The traces of Goethe's remorse which exist in Ghosts and Stella were alluded to, and the probable bad effect of Goethe's faithlessness upon his subsequent life, both in his inability to love again as he had once done, and in his attempt to substitute a Platonic affection for an ordinary love and marriage. In the case of Lili, the relations between the two families contributed greatly to break off the engagement; but all through the pre-Weimar period, as well as the early years at that place, the unwillingness of the elder Goethe to help his son to settle, together with the son's dislike of the profession of an advocate, were the constant determining causes which kept him from marrying, while the circumstances of the court life again put additional obstacles in the way. The relation—a pure one—with the Frau von Stein, was an attempt, manfully clung to, to find a pis-aller; and when this came to an end on Goethe's return from Italy, it was the tenacity with which, as the result of his whole past experience, Goethe clung to his unpromising amour with Christiane which went far to redeem it and to secure him a tolerable share of domestic happiness.—The president agreed generally with the lecturer's view of Goethe's various love affairs, but wished more importance to be assigned to Goethe's love for Lili, and thought that the elder Goethe's influence in preventing his son's marrying was perhaps somewhat overrated. He urged, moreover, that eighteenth century notions of love and marriage differed from our own.

FINE ART.

REMBRANDT'S DRAWINGS.

THE second series of reproductions of Rembrandt's drawings, which Dr. Lippmann—the well-known authority—of the Berlin Museum, has edited, and which can be seen in London at Messrs. Deprez and Gutekunst's, is, in some respects, even preferable to the first, of which we took careful note, on its appearance, about a year ago. The reproductions themselves are carried out with extraordinary success, and the subjects—which in some cases present greater difficulties—are, perhaps, upon the whole, more complex. No doubt, quite as large a proportion of the drawings in the present series represent the master's handling of the themes of landscape; and this is indeed well, for, while so many of Rembrandt's etchings are of landscape scenes, and while so many of his croquis with the pen and his slightly-washed drawings also record them, the student—if student we may call him—who knows Rembrandt exclusively by his painted work has little notion of his command of the aspects of outward nature. Yet nothing in the world shows more completely than Rembrandt's very slightest landscape drawings the magical addition to nature which it is the province of art to bestow. Though in one sense Rembrandt was a profound realist, and not an idealist at all, his work possessed that measure of idealism which belongs to whatever has received the inalienable gift of "style." The dignity of Rembrandt's vision—even more than the dexterity of his brush—elevated the most ordinary theme which he elected to treat.

Having thus by implication pronounced an éloge on every single landscape subject which may be beheld in this second series of reproductions from his drawings, let us, by way of change, draw attention briefly to one or two figure-pieces which strike us as even singularly memorable for the pregnancy of their expression. Of art, as well as of material fortunes, the Roman's saying is true: "Men do not understand how great a revenue there is in economy." Rembrandt did understand that; and it is through his economy of means that, alike in landscape and in figure subject, he has been able to leave us so varied and so vast a heritage. The drawing numbered 78—of which the principal figure is an old man, evidently of the superior classes, leaning upon a stick—is noteworthy for a dainty precision which it is not inappreciative of the rest to describe as exceptional. "Rembrandt's own Portrait in his Painting Dress"—a man of full middle age, facing the spectator, and looking at him with the utmost directness—is a most welcome and an unquestionably authentic addition to the counterfeited presentments of the master with which we are already familiar. The first drawing in this second series, "An Old Man Lying on his Deathbed, surrounded by his Family," recalls, though vaguely, the not less expressive and pathetic etching, "The Death of the Virgin." The several drawings of the nude figure—though not one of them approaches the occasional elegance of the etching of "The Woman with the Arrow"—all palpitate with life.

It is worthy of notice that more than half the drawings in the present series belong to the Duke of Devonshire. They are thirty-three in number, and they come—one and all—from the collection of Nicholas Antoni Flinck, the son of Govaert Flinck, the painter, one of the most approved of Rembrandt's pupils. It was in 1754 that they were purchased, at Rotterdam. Of the remaining drawings, the greater number belong to Mr. J. P. Heseltine, well known as a collector of fine taste and an excellent amateur etcher. Then there are four drawings from the Dresden Print Room, and two which are the private property of Prince George of Saxony. It may be remembered that in the first series by far the greater number of examples came from the Berlin Print Room, and the remainder from the cabinet of the English private collector who is represented in the present issue. English amateurs are much indebted to all those gentlemen who are assisting the publication which it has again been a pleasure to refer to.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

EXCAVATIONS IN THE FAYUM.

Jerusalem: March 30, 1890.

LAST October I resumed work on Kahun, the town of the XIIIth Dynasty from which I had obtained the things exhibited during the summer in London; and in November my friend Mr. Hughes-Hughes took up the work at Gurob, the town of the XVIII-XIXth Dynasty.

During my absence in England, Mr. Fraser, who kindly took charge of the place, had succeeded in entering the pyramid of Illahun, by a well which I had partly opened before I left. The arrangement of the pyramid is quite different to that of any other known. A shaft over forty feet deep descended from beneath the pavement near the south-east corner; thence a gently sloping passage led up in the rock to two chambers, not under the centre of the pyramid, but nearer to the shrine on the east side. The first chamber was lined with limestone, of which much had been removed, probably in Ramesside times; the inner chamber was lined with red granite in the same way as the sepulchre of Menkaura at Gizeh. It contains a red granite sarcophagus, without a trace of lid or contents. The form is strange, having a large rectangular lip or brim around the top. The sides are exquisitely flat and smooth, being dull-ground, but not polished. Their equality and regularity is astonishing, the errors of work being mostly one or two hundredths of an inch; and all the dimensions are in exact numbers of cubits and palms. It is the most brilliant piece of mechanical work yet known in Egypt, or perhaps in any other country. In front of it was the alabaster table of offerings for Useratesen II., whose name I had previously found in the temple of this pyramid.

A small pyramid, of which I discovered the base to the north-east of the large pyramid, I have now carefully cleared all around; but no trace of an entrance can be found. The occupant is, however, known from fragments of the external shrine, which bears the name of a Princess Atmu . . . (?), probably a daughter of Useratesen II.

At Kahun the remainder of the town was cleared, and all the houses planned. We now possess the complete design for a town as laid out by an architect of the XIIIth Dynasty. The larger houses have an atrium, with a small tank in the midst, at a little way from which are the surrounding columns, usually four on each side. These columns were of wood or stone; and a part of a wooden capital shows the palm type, which was as yet quite unknown to us at so early a date. The principal objects found are a basalt statuette of Si-sebek, an official; a seated figure in limestone; a most naturalistic ivory carving of an ape seated; a large wooden door with traces of cartouches and a scene of Usarkon II. (probably brought from some tomb in later times); a wooden stamp of Apepi; a large number of flint implements, wooden and bronze tools, weights, and many more of the apparently alphabetic marks on pottery. Outside of the town the rubbish heaps of the XIIth Dynasty were found; beneath and mixed with the pottery of that age were pieces of Aegean pottery, with rude decoration which, though barbaric in its style, is clearly the earliest step toward the Greek decoration. We thus appear to have reached the elements of the Aegean culture in 2500 B.C.

At Gurob the age of the Mykenae geometrical pottery is now completely settled, ranging from 1400-1200 B.C. Beneath the floors of many of the houses were found holes full of personal property, all burnt. Clothing, chairs, necklaces, mirrors, combs, pins, knives, alabaster cups, blue glazed bowls and kohl tubes, and the false-necked vases of Mykenae, are all found together, and the amulets and ornaments are of Tutankhamen and Ramesu II. These burnings are quite un-Egyptian in their nature, and probably are analogous to the Greek funeral pyre, thus maintained after the foreigners here had adopted burial in Egyptian fashion.

The next period, the introduction of plant design, is shown by an Aegean vase with ivy sprigs, found in a tomb at Kahun, which may be dated 1100 B.C.

A remarkable point of history is given on a small altar dedicated to the royal ka of Amenhotep III.; it appears to be one of a series made by Queen Thii for "her brother, her beloved, the good god Ra-ma-neb." This is the first real evidence as to the parentage of this celebrated queen, and shows that she was a sister-wife, like most of the queens of that age. Iuaa and Tuua were therefore be the familiar names of Tahutmes IV. and Mutemua. The name of the Mesopotamian daughter of Dushratta is yet unknown; but she cannot have been the same as Thii.

A great number of minor objects have also been found, which illustrate the manufactures of these periods, and are invaluable for dating the styles of the XIIth, XIXth, and XXIIIrd Dynasties.

These sites are now nearly exhausted; and I have closed my work in Egypt for this year, and I hope to soon begin excavations for the Palestine Exploration Fund on a Canaanite and Israelite town near Gaza.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE "GANGKEE TIGER."

8, Lezham-gardens, Oromwell-road, Kensington:
March 30, 1890.

A very bad copy of the famous "Gangkee Tiger" is now on the walls of the Japanese exhibition in the White Gallery at the British Museum.

The original of this picture, which came into my possession in 1869, belonged to the Prince of Matsui, and was taken from his palace during the insurrection of the Damiois, in February 1868, when the Damiois surrendered or lost their property, and the Tycoon was replaced by the Mikado.

In 1869 my picture of the "Gangkee Tiger" was exhibited in the South Kensington Museum, where it remained four years.

The marvellous skill of the painting will, doubtless, be remembered by many of your readers; and if any should be interested in the comparison of the original with the copy now shown to the public, I shall be happy to show my valuable specimen of early Japanese art to any gentleman who will call by appointment at my house.

ALFRED BARTON.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

It is understood that Mr. Frith has requested to be placed on the retired list of the Royal Academicians.

A SPECIAL course of lectures is now being delivered at the Guild and School of Handicraft, 34, Commercial Street, E. Last Thursday Mr. Henry Holiday was the lecturer. Next Thursday, April 10, Mr. Cobden Sanderson will lecture on "Book-binding." On April 17 Mr. W. B. Richmond will take "Gesso-work" as his subject. The last two lectures of the course will be given on April 24 and May 1 by Mr. Stirling Lee ("A Talk on Sculpture," with practical illustrations), and by Mr. E. P. Warren ("Parlour Architecture"). On May 5 the next school-term will be opened, when the Marquis of Ripon will preside at the first of a course of lectures by Mr. C. R. Ashbee on "The Architectural Story of England." The lectures begin at 8 p.m., and are all free.

MR. FELIX JOSEPH, to whom the Nottingham Castle Museum is already indebted for several valuable donations, has just presented to that institution a collection of about two hundred drawings of the early English school, intended for book-illustration. Most of the drawings are in sepia, and are in a perfect state of preservation. The artists represented include Thomas Stothard, Robert Smirke, Richard and William Westall, Thomas Uwins, S. Wale, and Wright of Derby.

MR. JOHN H. NODAL has written an introduction to the catalogue of a collection of the engraved work of Samuel Cousins, which is now on exhibition at the Manchester Arts Club. The entire collection—all of artist proofs—is lent by one member, who possesses examples of all but two of the total number of 194 plates which Cousins engraved. In addition, Mrs. Frank Holl has lent the original portrait of Cousins painted by her husband in 1879. An etching of this by M. O. Waltner is hung opposite Cousins's mezzotint of his own portrait by Mr. Edwin Long—the last plate that he worked upon.

THE proprietors of L'Art offer prizes for three competitions: (1) original etchings; (2) etchings after pictures, ancient or modern; and (3) designs for the cover of the bound volume of the review. Proofs of the etchings, which are limited as to size, must be sent in before October 21; the designs before June 15.

It has been left to Mr. W. B. Hole—whose etchings in the Edinburgh volume were a trifle mannered and unequal, though in several points clever—to produce at last what is probably the most characteristic rendering of a characteristic Millet. "The Wood Sawyers" is a somewhat slightly executed but most vigorous and veracious example of the master. It belongs to Mr. Constantine Ionides. The plate which Mr. Hole has done from it is a large one, and it is largely treated; but under the apparent breadth there is discernible to the expert any amount of well-directed labour. The plate is a pure etching, infinite in variety of tone—as good in this respect as a mezzotint, yet with all the virility of the etched line. The extent, nevertheless, to which the engraver has artistically subordinated himself to the painter—seeking only to deliver the painter's message, in the painter's own tongue, so to say—is very remarkable. Millet's very brush-work appears to be rendered. It is certainly suggested in an amazingly dexterous, yet never in an obtrusively clever, fashion.

THE STAGE.

Idols of the French Stage. By H. Sutherland Edwards. In 2 vols. (Remington.)

MR. EDWARDS'S volumes are of the kind now common in the literature of the stage—scrappy, not invariably accurate, but seldom or never dull. Possibly stimulated by the welcome extended to a similar work in Paris, he presents us with accounts—generally in the most approved anecdotic style—of Armande Molière, Adrienne Lecouvreur, Marie Favart, Sophie Arnould, Marie de Camargo, Madeleine Guimard, Louise Dugazon, Hippolyte Clairon, Louise Contat, Françoise Raucourt, Anne de Saint-Huberty, Rachel Félix, and Mme. Sarah Bernhardt. He passes lightly over the surface of his subject; to other than personal matters he pays scant attention. His chief purpose is to entertain his readers, and in this he may be said to have succeeded. Whatever else may be thought of the book, it is at least a fresh proof of his literary tact, his knowledge of theatrical ana, his keen sense of all that is striking in incident and character.

In one case, there can be no doubt, Mr. Edwards has increased the attractiveness of his pages at the expense of hard facts. To rank Armande Molière among the "idols" of the stage is to convey a most erroneous idea of the position she actually occupied. Piquant as her acting often was, it is clear that she did not possess exceptional talents, produce exceptional effects, or acquire exceptional popularity. Tradition is all but silent as to her achievements, even in such parts as Célimène. Indeed, had it not been for her illustrious husband, who wrote for and assiduously coached her, she would have failed to rise above mediocrity. From the time of his death, which occurred in her twenty-eighth year, she gradually dropped out of sight, although Louis XIV. made her one of the first sociétaires of the Comédie Française. Why, then, does Mr. Edwards treat her as entitled to a place in this gallery of portraits? Few questions could be more promptly answered. He would not miss a chance of dealing with her private life. In the biography of Molière, as most of us know, she is a very important figure. Without unusual graces of person or mind, she yet aroused in him an affection which the discovery of her unfaithfulness seemed only to intensify; and many exquisite scenes in his plays, especially the "Misanthrope," owe their origin to and reflect the anguish she inflicted upon him. For these reasons Mr. Edwards draws up an elaborate record of her career, at the same time naïvely admitting that she was aided less by her talents than by the name she unworthily bore. To him, as to so many writers, the temptation to make capital of La Fausse Comédienne—that curious mixture of probable truth and demonstrated falsehood—has been practically irresistible.

Mr. Edwards devotes seventy pages to Armande Molière, but omits to speak of two actresses who rose to the highest distinction. One of these was Racine's sometime mistress, Marie Champmélé. In tragedy she reigned supreme for nearly thirty years, and of many familiar characters in the old classical drama—Bérénice, Roxane, Monime, Iphigénie, and, more important than all, Phèdre—she was the first representative. It is needless to go further than a collection of letters which Mr. Edwards must have read to find how powerful were the impressions she created.

"It is only to enjoy Champmélé's acting," Mme. de Sévigné wrote in 1672, "that I have seen Thomas Corneille's 'Ariane.' It is a poor tragedy; all the characters are execrable. But when she appears a murmur of admiration is heard; everyone is enthralled, and her despair moves the audience to tears. . . . Champmélé seems to me the most wonderful actress I have seen. She is a thousand times better than Descoilleux; and I, who am supposed to have some talent for acting, am not worthy of lighting the candles when she appears."

The other luminary passed over in silence by Mr. Edwards is Marie Dumesnil, "la bonne Dumesnil" of eighteenth-century correspondence. Physically fragile, she could scale the heights of tragedy with ease and power, and was so terrible as Cléopâtre in "Rodogune" that when she swept down to the footlights the spectators there involuntarily shrank back. In scenes of pure tenderness, too, she was equally at home. "What do you think," asks Voltaire, after avowing that she made the success of his "Mérope," "of an actress who keeps us all in tears for three acts together?" It is surely matter for wonder that Mr. Edwards should have ignored the existence of these mistresses of their art, to say nothing of Jeanne Gauguier, Marie Dangeville, or Mdlle. Mars.

From a purely theatrical point of view the narrative has less interest than its title might suggest. Mr. Edwards has not sought to make it a valuable contribution to the history of the French stage. Nearly the whole of the chapter relating to Adrienne Lecouvreur, for example, is taken up with her misplaced affection for Maurice de Saxe, her rejection of the proffered hand of the Comte d'Argental, and the circumstances that were long supposed to have attended her death. What Mdlle. Aïssé has said on the last-mentioned subject is quoted at length; but the suspicion that the great actress was poisoned by a jealous lady of high degree is disposed of by the testimony of Voltaire, who caused the body to be opened. Of Marie Favart's merits in comic opera we hear very little; and of her innovations as regards theatrical costume—for she was the first player to discard silks and diamonds and wigs when they were out of character—we hear nothing at all. Instead of information on these heads, there is a minute record of the persecution which she endured at the hands of Maurice de Saxe rather than become his mistress, and which, pace Mr. Edwards, culminated in her being shut up under a lettre de cachet until she yielded. Lastly, two-thirds of the article on Hippolyte Clairon, beyond doubt the most impressive actress of her time, is occupied by a translation of the absurd ghost story in her Mémoires. Mr. Edwards has yet something to learn about this wayward and eccentric lady. According to him, she was born to shine in comedy, and, although successful in the tragedies of Corneille and Racine, showed the perfection of her talent in Molière's characters. Here, as in his assertion that she was sent to For l'Evêque for organising a cabal against a rival, he is absolutely mistaken. With Molière's characters she had no sympathy; it was only in the tragedies of Corneille and Racine that she found a congenial element.

Curiously enough, the least satisfactory part of the work is that which relates to Mme. Sarah Bernhardt. Beginning with the well-known story of her recitation in early life before Auber, Mr. Edwards is content to devote only five arid pages to her career, and has as much to say of her passion for notoriety as of her intellectual gifts. One serious blunder must be laid to his charge. In 1880, he tells us, she was "so enraged by an uncomplimentary newspaper criticism that she sent in her resignation to M. Emile Perrin, director of the theatre, quitted Paris, and came to England, where she gave a series of representations, and, appearing among us for the first time, caused a veritable sensation in London society."

The italics, of course, are mine. Mr. Edwards seems to have been out of the world in the summer of 1879, when the Comédie Française fulfilled their memorable engagement at the Gaiety, and when Mme. Bernhardt, as one of the company, electrified audience after audience, became the cynosure of all eyes in representative drawing-rooms, received the most flattering social homage, and was written about by a thousand pens.

FREDERICK HAWKINS.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MODERN Belgian music played a large part at the second Philharmonic Concert given at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening, March 27. In fact, foreign composers are being made much of by the Philharmonic Society. In this we see no harm; for if native art needs encouragement, it also needs competition. English musicians should have means of learning what is being done for music abroad; yet only the best should be brought forward. One cannot but wonder how the Orchestral Selection from M. P. Benoit's music to the drama "Charlotte Corday" was fixed upon as worthy of a hearing. As a rule, music written in connexion with the stage suffers when torn from its surroundings; and it is highly probable that these movements are not placed in the most favourable light on the concert platform. But as they were given with the composer's sanction, and indeed under his direction, his work may be judged from an abstract point of view. M. Benoit is a musician whose spirit has been stirred within him by the brilliant orchestration of Berlioz and by the powerful music-dramas of Wagner. Fine sounds, however, do not make fine music; and form, unless quickened by genius, is meaningless. M. Benoit's intentions are of the best, but his discernment does not keep pace with his desires. In the "Charlotte Corday" Suite, one meets with passages of merit, but the interest is not sustained. Indeed, the composer achieves success in inverse ratio to his efforts; hence the simple "Idyll" and the "Ball" scene are more satisfactory than the Overture and the Finale, which are meant to be dramatic, but are only melodramatic. The programme included songs by M. Huberti, another Belgian composer. "Le Munnezanger" has a picturesque orchestral accompaniment; but two other songs proved, in spite of some good ideas, exaggerated in sentiment. They were sung by M. Blauwaert. The orchestra was under the direction of M. Huberti. M. Ysaye, who made his first appearance here last season, gave a magnificent rendering of Viouxtemps's showy Violin Concerto in D minor. His tone was pure and rich, his execution faultless, and he entered thoroughly into the spirit of the music. He was received with enthusiasm, and for an encore played a Paganini Caprice. Haydn's genial "Reine de France" Symphony was admirably rendered under the direction of Mr. F. H. Cowen.

Beethoven's Oratorio, "The Mount of Olives," was performed at the Crystal Palace last Saturday afternoon. In spite of the high opus number (85), it is one of the composer's early works; and from remarks afterwards made by him it is clear that he was not satisfied with it. The orchestral Introduction and following Recitative, the soprano and tenor Duet, and the concluding "Hallelujah" chorus, however, atone in a measure for any weakness in the other movements. The soloists were Miss Anne Marriott, and Messrs. Piercy and Watkin Mills. The performance of the work was moderately good. It has not been given at the Crystal Palace since the year 1876—a sufficient proof that the Oratorio is not a special favourite with the public. The programme included Dr. Bridge's interesting setting of "Book of Ages," written for the Birmingham Festival of 1885, Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, and Dr. Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist" Overture.

The concluding Popular Concert of the season took place on Monday evening last. The programme opened with Mozart's Quintet in G Minor, his masterpiece in that particular style. Messrs. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Gibson, and Piatti were the able interpreters. Miss Fanny Davies and Signor Piatti gave an excellent rendering of Rubinstein's showy Sonata in D (op. 18) for pianoforte and 'cello. Spohr's Concerto in B minor (op. 88) for two violins was performed for the first time at these concerts. This work, written shortly after the composer had settled at Cassel in the service of the Elector, is perfectly clear in structure, and, moreover, full of those brilliant bravura passages which Spohr knew so well how to write. It consists of three movements—the middle one, an Andantino, is extremely graceful. Mme. Néruda and Dr. Joachim, of course, played the concerto to perfection, and at the close were recalled four times. The pianoforte accompaniment was in the safe hands of Miss Agnes Zimmermann. This lady also took part in Schumann's pianoforte Quintet (op. 44). Contrary to the usual practice on the concluding night, there was no pianoforte solo. Miss L. Lehmann was most successful. She sang a quaint and graceful anonymous song, entitled "La charmante Marguerite."

BRET HARTE'S NEW STORY.—Crown 8vo., cloth extra, 3s. 6d., with 60 Illustrations by STANLEY L. WOOD.
A WAIF of the PLAINS. By BRET HARTE, Author of "The Luck of Roaring Camp."
"Mr. Bret Harte's latest story, 'A Waif of the Plains,' is as good as his first—just as fresh, just as novel, and perhaps better written. . . . He is the most delightful author of a continent."—Daily News.
"A new book by Bret Harte is always welcome, and in 'A Waif of the Plains' he does not fall far below his best. The story abounds in artless pathos. . . . Nobody, we imagine, will pick the book up without reading it to the final page, for it not merely depicts Western life in a masterly fashion, but is full of unforced humour, whilst at the same time there is no lack of dramatic interest."—Leeds Mercury.

MARK TWAIN'S NEW BOOK.
A YANKEE at the COURT of KING ARTHUR. By MARK TWAIN. With 220 Illustrations by Dan Beard. Crown 8vo., cloth extra, 7s. 6d.
"Undoubtedly one of the funniest books, if not absolutely the funniest, that Mark Twain has ever written, and it will be laughed at heartily by thousands of readers in both hemispheres."—Scotsman.

A NEW BOOK BY SIR CHARLES DILKE, BART.

PROBLEMS OF GREATER BRITAIN.

By the RIGHT HON. SIR CHARLES DILKE, BART.
With Maps. 2 vols. 8vo, 30s. [Second Edition.]

The Cape Argus says: "Sir Charles Dilke's new book strikes us as altogether the most valuable contribution of the day. No writer has so fully succeeded in placing before us the Colonial attitude of mind. Our own hope is that it may be the Colonial office rather than the Foreign office that may claim him."

The Cape Times says: "Nought but unstinted praise can be given to the aim of the book and the form in which the conclusions are dressed. The volume is the weightiest argument that has ever been delivered for unity. Like an illustrious ancient, Sir Charles Dilke has visited many cities and seen many peoples. 'The Problems of Greater Britain' will, as the work of a Liberal statesman, do much to clear the character of that Party of a vile-founded charge of indifference to Colonial interests."

THE MARQUESS of DALHOUSIE.

By SIR WILLIAM WILSON HUNTER, K.O.S.I., C.I.E., M.A., LL.D.

Editor of the Series; Author of "The Annals of Rural Bengal," "The Indian Empire," "The Imperial Gazetteer of India," "A Brief History of the Indian People," &c.

The distinctive plan of the series is to present to English readers the salient outlines and turning-points in the evolution of the Indian Empire in a carefully planned sequence of historical retrospects. Each volume will take a conspicuous epoch in the making of India, and, under the name of its principal personage, will set forth the problems of government which confronted him, the work which he achieved, and the influences which he left behind.

The series will be produced under the general supervision of Sir W. W. HUNTER, whose reputation in the fields of Indian History, Statistics, and Administration is well known, and no effort has been spared to secure for each volume the writer best qualified to illustrate the period entrusted to him.

"Sir William Hunter has produced a valuable work about an important epoch of English history in India, and he has given us a pleasing insight into the character of a remarkable Englishman. The 'Rulers of India' series which he has initiated thus makes a successful beginning in his hands with one who ranks among the greatest of the great names which will be associated with the subject."—Times.

Further Volumes are in active preparation, and will be published shortly.

SIN of JOOST AVELINGH: a Novel. By Maarten

MAARTENS. 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s.

"A book by a man who, in addition to mere talent, has in him a vein of such genuine genius, &c."—Academy. "Unquestionably a good piece of work."—Athenaeum. "So unmistakably good as to induce the hope that an acquaintance with the Dutch literature of fiction may soon become more general among us."—Morning Post. "In scarcely any novel of the sensational novels of the day will the reader find more nature or more human nature."—Standard. "A novel of a very high type. At once strongly realistic and powerfully idealistic."—Literary World. "Full of local colour and rich in quaint phraseology and suggestion."—Daily Telegraph. "So good that it will find many readers here."—Scotsman. "Maarten Maartens is a capital story teller."—Pall Mall Gazette. "A singularly powerful and original study. Exceedingly dramatic characters. Full of pathos."—Graphic. "Can honestly be recommended to readers whether with consciences or without."—James Payn in Illustrated London News. "Romantic without being sickly, and full of interest without being sensational."—Vanity Fair. "Our English writers of fiction will have to look to their laurels."—Birmingham Daily Post. "Qualities of imagination which Dutch art hardly ever achieves save on the canvases of Rembrandt."—Manchester Examiner. "Interest of an absorbing and, at times, of a lurid character. Very powerful scenes."—Sunday Times.

THE BLACK BOX MURDER: a Story. By the MAN WHO DISCOVERED the MURDERER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A capital story, well and straightforwardly written."—World. "A brisk and clever story.....Will bear favourable comparison with the shilling shockers."—Figaro.

LITERATURE.

"GREAT WRITERS."—Life of Robert Browning.
By William Sharp. (Walter Scott.)

MR. SHARP, with characteristic promptitude, has already produced a biography of Robert Browning, a book which certainly shows no sign of haste or immaturity. Its author modestly puts it forward as merely a mémoire pour servir. But, indeed, it may be regarded as furnishing all, or nearly all, that the student of Browning needs to know regarding the life and personality of the great poet; though, of course, other fuller biographies will in time follow, and will be welcome when they come—biographies, let us hope, which will draw largely upon Browning's always interesting and matterful correspondence, and be rich in their record of those familiar little anecdotes of the man, sweet and quaintly characteristic as many of these are, which rank, and will always rank, among the most cherished memories of his friends.

Mr. Sharp opens his book with a rapid but comprehensive glance at the condition of European literature and intellectual effort generally at the time of Browning's birth, and an enumeration of the men of mark who were his contemporaries at the beginning of his career. Then comes an account of the Browning family and of the immediate ancestors of the poet, a part of his work in which Mr. Sharp acknowledges his indebtedness to a privately-printed pamphlet by that well-known and enthusiastic Browningite, Dr. Furnivall. Trustworthy evidence is adduced to show that there is no proof for the often-repeated statement that certain of the poet's forefathers were Jews. In the male line he is said to have been descended from that Capt. Browning who commanded the ship in which Henry V. sailed to France previous to the battle of Agincourt, and whose shield bore, in memory of the expedition, gules, two bendlets wavy, argent and or—a shield borne by his descendant Micaiah Browning, who raised the siege of Derry in 1689 by springing the boom across Lough Foyle, and perished in the act. These were also used by the poet himself. His maternal grandmother was partly German, partly Scottish; while his paternal grandmother was a Creole, born in the West Indies. His ancestry, accordingly, was a curiously mixed one; and doubtless much of his versatility and varied power is traceable to these strangely mingled currents of blood that fed his brain and heart.

He was not the first of his family in whom artistic and literary power had manifested itself. His uncle, William Shergold Browning, was the author of a well-known History of the Huguenots; and to his father—a clerk in the Bank of England during a great part of his life—"shop" was "shop only," for in his leisure he had time and taste for scholarship, for drawing, for the practice of verse. In his son's words, "his brain was a storehouse of literary and philosophical antiquities. He was completely versed in mediæval legend, and seemed to have known Paracelsus, Faustus, and even Talmudic personages personally." It is further recorded of the father of the author of The Ring and the Book that he possessed "an extraordinary analytical faculty in the elucidation of complex criminal cases." The mother, too, was a skilled musician—a woman of exceptional sweetness and depth of religious feeling.

Nothing could well have been happier or more fortunately ordered than was this poet's childhood. The father was much with his children; and we have a charming picture of how he used to carry his infant son in his arms up and down the study, singing him to sleep with lines of Anacreon. Of his debt to this wise and loving father Browning was fully conscious; and only a few weeks before his death he expressed himself on the subject in words that may well be quoted:

"It would have been quite unpardonable in my case not to have done my best. My dear father put me in a condition most favourable for the best work I was capable of. When I think of the many authors who have had to fight their way through all sorts of difficulties, I have no reason to be proud of my achievements. My good father . . . secured for me all the ease and comfort that a literary man needs to do good work. It would have been shameful if I had not done my best to realise his expectations of me."

In that cultured home of his, the ways leading to very varied kinds of intellectual effort lay open to young Browning; and, with strong aptitudes in many directions, he seems at first to have hesitated as to the choice of his life-work. It is significant that, even after he had published his first poetic volume, he was regarded by his friends rather as a musician and artist than as a poet. His introduction to the works of Shelley affected him most powerfully, and must have done much towards enabling him to discover his own true self, his real vocation. Shelley's books were procured for him, at his own request, by his mother; and what an epoch the first reading of them must have made in his life—what a moment that must have been when he first "saw Shelley plain"! The influence of the earlier poet is distinctly traceable—along with much that is by no means derivative—in Browning's own initial volume, Pauline, whose publication in 1833 was rendered possible through the generosity of his aunt. Of this poem Mr. Sharp gives a full, interesting, and discerning account, rightly assigning to it "a unique significance because of its autopsychical hints." Our author draws attention to the fact that this book, as also Paracelsus which followed it in 1835—unknown as they remained to the general public until within quite recent years—received a thoroughly cordial welcome upon their publication from a judicious few, the Rev. W. J. Fox and Allan Cunningham reviewing the former most favourably in the Monthly Repository and the Athenæum; and John Forster, on the evidence of the latter, venturing, in the New Monthly Magazine, "without the slightest hesitation," to "name Mr. Robert Browning at once with Shelley, Coleridge, Wordsworth."

There is little of striking incident to record in the poet's life during the years that immediately followed the publication of Pauline. He spent some time in Russia, a visit which left its trace in the vivid local colouring of "Iván Ivánovitch" published more than forty years later; and he then passed to Italy, which, often revisited, afforded a lifelong inspiration to his art.

In 1846 came the union of Robert Browning to that great English poetess who bore his name. It seems that the accepted story as to their first romantically accidental meeting must be abandoned. It used to be said that Miss Barrett had written something in praise of Browning's verse, that he called on her to express his sense of obligation, and—owing to the mistake of a servant—was admitted to the room of the invalid authoress, whose state of health at the time was such that she was able to admit the visits of only her most intimate friends. Mr. Sharp, however, asserts, authoritatively that Miss Barrett's future husband was introduced by her genial and generous cousin John Kenyon. Meet, at any rate, they did; and the meeting led to a marriage which—in spite of the implacable disapproval of the bride's father—was a thoroughly fortunate one, a union of mutual love and helpfulness. The wedded pair went direct to Italy, where Mrs Browning's health improved marvelously, where her son was born, and where, for the most part, she enjoyed fifteen years of prosperous and happy poetic labour.

She passed away in 1861, leaving a blank in her husband's heart never to be filled again. But his age was far indeed from desolate, for he was ministered to by his noble and devoted sisters, and he was bound up in the artistic efforts and successes of his son, Robert Barrett Browning, the painter and sculptor. To the very last he was strenuously busied with his own chosen art; and in all things he led the life of one who wisely "lives and likes life's way," the best known and most easily accessible man in London society, generously helpful, as surely great poet never was before—helpful with that best kind of help which is perfect sympathy—to the literary workers, celebrated or unknown, who surrounded him; till at length he died last year at Venice, in the arms of those who loved him most, in full possession of intellectual and poetic power, and with the news of the success of his last just issued book sounding in his ears. It was a prosperous and happy life come to a good ending; a life so strenuous in effort, so lofty in aim, so rightly poised, so genial and magnanimous in every relation, that it well deserved all the prosperity with which it was filled to overflowing.

Into the careful and well-weighed estimate of Browning's poetic power and his place in literature, with which Mr. Sharp concludes his volume, we are unable here to enter fully. We cannot but agree that this great poet has written much which it would have been better for his poetic fame if he had left unwritten; much which, if it have an attractiveness, is merely curious, merely interesting—certainly not poetic. But, if his works include failures, how superb, how numerous are the successes that they comprise; and for freshness, for power, for variety, for beauty, how few poets can show such a gathering of over a hundred pieces as Mr. Sharp has enumerated on pages 129-131! To one point in the estimate of the present biographer I must take distinct exception. Among the reasons that will prevent Browning from "standing out gigantic" in mass of imperishable work," Mr. Sharp ranks first "that fatal excess of cold over emotive thought—of thought that, however profound, incisive, or scrupulously clear, is not yet impassioned." Now it appears to me one of the very chief characteristics of Browning's verse that he never does give us mere cold disquisition, the like of which we find in such tedious plenty in Wordsworth; that he never is dryly, mechanically logical; that the arguments of which his poems are full are never chill bits of absolute science, divorced from humanity, but are always flushed through and through with human emotion—are the speech of actual men, speech in which the whole man, and not his mere isolated intellect, finds expression and embodiment. As Mr. Sharp properly points out, the monologue of Abt Vogler is illogical in the reasons upon which it bases a belief in immortality; it is, however, poetical, because it is the record of impassioned human thought, and, as such, is dramatically true.

Mr. Sharp's volume will be read with interest by all admirers of the great poet whose life it chronicles, whose work it records and expounds. In composition and style it seems to me the most successful book of its author's that I have yet examined.

J. M. GRAY

Correspondence between the Right Honourable William Pitt and Charles Duke of Rutland, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, 1781-1787.
With an Introductory Note by John Duke of Rutland. (Blackwood.)

IN December, 1783, began the momentous administration of William Pitt, and the Duke of Rutland, a young man of no great capacity, but personally devoted to Pitt, was chosen to be his first Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. The letters which they exchanged on public affairs up to the date of Rutland's death are now very opportunely reprinted from a private edition of 1842, and the inner mind of the administration during a very important period of Irish history is laid bare to students. Certainly, neither Pitt nor Rutland is in any degree shamed by the records which here leap to light, nor are they perceptibly exalted either. Both statesmen show a general desire to stand on right ground, to remedy substantial grievances, if it can be done without giving offence to powerful adherents; but no passionate sense of justice—such as, for instance, Lord Cornwallis long afterwards displayed in speaking of a subject which had engaged the attention of Pitt and Rutland, the Tithe Laws—marks their interchange of thought on Irish affairs. Ireland was for them simply the Pale—the Pale, not now as a geographical but as a religious or social expression. Pitt, as we all know, was afterwards led to widen his views very considerably, and the present correspondence is chiefly valuable for the light which it throws on this development.

Pitt's Irish policy really had its root in England. He was sincerely and ardently anxious for a reform of Parliamentary representation in that country; but if reform were granted in England it could not reasonably or safely be denied to Ireland, where, as Rutland observes, the "system of Parliament" did not "bear the smallest resemblance to representation." But if the administration were to lose the power it had always possessed of practically nominating a majority of the Irish Parliament, what would or might become of that identity of executive which Pitt regarded as essential to the connexion of the two countries? The conclusion which he at last arrived at was that a certain "prudent and temperate reform of Parliament" might safely be granted if one important condition were first fulfilled, namely, that Ireland should be bound to England in the intimate and vital connexion of a commercial union, which would make "England and Ireland one country in effect, though for local concerns under distinct legislatures" (P. to R., January 6, 1785). The reform, when granted, should be of such a nature as to "unite the Protestant interest in excluding the Catholics from any share in the representation or the government of the country" (P. to R., October 7, 1784).

How strangely was this line of policy reversed in the end! Instead of the "prudent reform" which was to cure "real defects and mischiefs," and the consolidation of the Protestant interest for the absolute exclusion of the Catholics, we have, in the last decade of the Irish Parliament, the denial of all reform, all redress, and the overthrow of the Protestant interest by the conferring upon the Catholics of such a share in the representation of the country as neither they nor the liberal Protestants who advocated their cause in Parliament had ever dreamt of claiming for them. The object of this reversal was unquestionably to force the country to a union; for this we have Pitt's own word in a letter written to Lord Westmorland early in 1792. But when and how did the necessity of a political union first begin to impress itself on Pitt's mind? Clearly it was when Ireland, in 1785, rejected his scheme for a commercial union. That scheme was to be the basis of a great policy of regeneration and consolidation.

"On this point," writes Pitt, on February 24, 1785, "the sense both of Parliament and the nation is decided, that if we fail in this, everything we have hoped for is suspended. What the consequences finally may be it is impossible to guess."

How far Grattan and the popular party were to blame, as statesmen, in this fateful rejection of the commercial union is a question on which some competent investigator might found a very interesting essay. Their action certainly cannot be written down to factious folly in the offhand manner adopted in a recent "History of the Irish Union," by a writer who is not even aware of the nature of the propositions which they rejected. The scheme was first presented to them in the form of Eleven Resolutions providing for perfect reciprocity of advantages and equalisation of duties between England and Ireland, while the common participation of burdens was provided for by the imposition on Ireland of an annual contribution towards the maintenance of the navy, a contribution skilfully arranged so as to increase with the increasing prosperity of the country as testified by the productiveness of certain duties. The popular party in Ireland received the propositions with the greatest cordiality, Grattan himself assisted in giving them their final shape, and Parliament passed them without opposition. Even the provision of the tribute, on which some hesitation was expected, was accepted as a just and reasonable arrangement. Far different was the reception they met with in the British Parliament. They had scarcely appeared there when they had to be withdrawn in obedience to the clamour of the English and Scotch manufacturing and agricultural interests, intensely alarmed at the notion of admitting Irish products to free competition with their own. And when they reappeared in the form of Twenty Resolutions, it was found that some very serious modifications in the original principle of perfect reciprocity and freedom of trade had been introduced, all to the disadvantage of Ireland. Thus, Ireland was now debarred from ever trading with the East Indies, so long as the British Parliament chose to continue the charter of the East India Company, then approaching its expiration. Again, by the Twenty Resolutions, either country might tax or prohibit the import of bread-stuffs from the other, a provision which, as England was then becoming a corn-importing, and Ireland a corn-exporting, country, pressed gravely against the latter. England, too, was now permitted to give bounties on the exportation of beer and spirits to Ireland, while Ireland was forbidden to give bounties on the exportation of these commodities to England. Such alterations as these were quite enough to make the Irish Parliament suspect that it was being dishonestly dealt with; but the hostile feeling they aroused there was insignificant compared with that produced by the fourth and fifth of the new Twenty Resolutions, which provided that Ireland should at once enact, without modification, all laws which had been, or should hereafter be, passed by England regulating or restraining the trade of the Kingdom with the British or foreign colonies, Africa or America. Rutland at once pronounced it hopeless to attempt to carry the Commercial Union with such an addition as this, and the event proved that he was right. Grattan denounced the proposed subversion of the legislative independence of Ireland in a speech "of the most beautiful eloquence perhaps ever heard, but seditious and inflammatory to a degree hardly credible" (R. to P. August 13, 1785).

What was Pitt's motive in insisting on a provision certain to wreck the first great project of his administration? The security of the Irish contribution (which was to consist of the surplus over a given yield of certain customs) was, he declared, gone without it. But surely this security could have been attained without the complete abrogation of Ireland's legislative independence in commercial matters; and it is certain that in the Eleven Resolutions which were presented to both Parliaments as a full and final measure there was no trace of any such provision. The fact is that the obnoxious clause represented a serious blunder in policy, as we may clearly see from the letter of Pitt to Rutland of May 21, 1785. Fox had seen his opportunity on the introduction of the Eleven Resolutions; and, as the mouthpiece of the English manufacturers, he had denounced them with unbounded indignation, on the charge that they made the commercial interests of England abjectly and helplessly subservient to those of Ireland. This criticism of Fox (which I may remark, en passant, is quoted by the historical writer before alluded to in order to show how good the Twenty Resolutions would have been for Ireland!) produced that fourth clause which at once became the turning-point of the controversy. Fox immediately, and with great effect, transferred to the imperilled liberties of Ireland the passionate solicitude which he had previously been displaying about the commercial interests of England. Rutland warned and expostulated; but Pitt could no longer vacillate in the face of the watchful and powerful enemy who had already forced him from one position, and the new Resolutions had to stand for good or ill.

The commercial union is by far the most interesting topic treated of in this correspondence; but there are amusing incidental revelations of the methods of securing political support which prevailed in those days, and which, perhaps, are not wholly unheard-of in these. "A decayed gentleman, and particularly if a member of Parliament," writes the Viceroy on September 13, 1786, "is surely a proper object" for a provision of £300 a year. This about Lord Mountjoy's peerage is full of dry light. The Marquess of Buckingham represents to Pitt:

"That a peerage was promised to Mr. G. by the Earl of Bucks in 1779" [and at other times by other people].

"That this promise and that to Lord Chief Baron Burgh was acknowledged by Lord Northampton, but refused by him, by which refusal Mr. Gardiner was driven into opposition, in which he embarked in the business of protecting duties, &c.

"That upon the change of government I was desired to converse with him upon the subject of those motions, and specifically to throw out the idea of his attaining his object, it being then deemed essential to check that question, to which his name and credit gave much support. I certainly held myself authorised to hold it out to him in case of his support, which he promised; stating, however, that he had pledged himself to move that question after the recess; but that he would take the first moment to quit it, and to return to that system from which he had been driven by Lord Northampton."

T. W. ROLLESTON.

Westminster Chimes, and other Poems. By Maxwell Gray. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

WRITERS of romances are often curiously eager to become poets. That they seldom attain their wish is also a curious fact. The qualities which go to the making of a poet are, in the main, precisely those with which they are endowed. Imagination, insight, sympathy, powers of humour, of pathos, of picturesque description—these are essentially characteristic of poet and romance-writer alike. But there is as little actual identity between the two as there is between the musician and the mechanic. Even Scott, who achieved greater success in poetry than any subsequent writer of fiction has done, only put romances into verse. After he had found out that he could write them more effectively in prose, he recognised prose as his true medium. The late Lord Lytton's failure as a poet was as conspicuous as his efforts were ambitious. George Eliot did somewhat better; but the fine passages of "The Spanish Gypsy" are mere rhetoric when compared with the genuine eloquence of thought and speech—the true vividness of life and movement—in her novels. Poets whose vocation as singers is beyond doubt fail with as much certainty when they put off their singing robes and don those of the narrator. Thus, the weakest of all Lord Tennyson's long poems is "Enoch Arden."

The author of The Silence of Dean Maitland, having by that powerful romance proved that romance is her strong point, must needs tempt her fate with a book of verse. Perhaps she consoled herself with the knowledge that if she failed in the venture she would still be in good company. I fear it cannot be said that she has not failed, if the measure of her success in prose may furnish a standard for her verse. She will not take such a place among the poets as her first romance gave her among the writers of prose fiction. But where high achievement is hard, and counts for much, partial achievement should count for something. There are poems in this volume that would have made a reputation before fluency in verse became so common a thing as it is. Maxwell Gray differs, however, from the majority of minor poets in the fact that what she gives us is her own to give. She has not borrowed it from some abler singer. Her voice is thin, and for a thin voice is much too voluble; but it is a true voice, and no make-believe. I am bound to qualify this testimony by saying that, while the style is natural and native, there is nothing new in the thoughts, nor is the manner of expressing them one which the reader will remember for anything really noteworthy about it. The following examples from the chief poem in the volume—the first putting into words the chimes from Westminster Palace, as the poet interprets them, and the second giving in like manner the echoes from the Abbey—will illustrate the foregoing criticisms:

"PALACE CHIMES.

"Rejoice! rejoice!
For the strength of man,
For the fervid noon of his summer night,
For strength to do and skill to plan;
For full delight
When the day of life is far from night;
For the treasure of gold and of exquisite art;
For the luxuries piled in the world's great mart;
For the sweat ordained,
The muscles strained,
And the triumph that crowns, though half achieved,
Man's work in the prowess by hope believed;
Ah me! ah me!"

"ABBEY ECHOES.

"Ah me! ah me!
For the fainting man,
Weak to do, though strong to plan,
By the burden and heat of day outworn;
Succour him, lift him, fall'n forlorn!
Alas! alas! for the bitter sweat
With which his burning brow was wet,
The toil that piled those heaps of gold,
But left him hungry and a-cold,

The skill that shaped those things of grace
While the friendless artist drooped apace!
Poor and rich and weak and strong,
Ye are sons of Him who avenges wrong,
And He has riches manifold,
Better than jewel, silk, or gold;
Rejoice! rejoice!"

All this is excellent of its kind: the thoughts have the truth of truisms, but the graces of verse have not enriched them. A chime naturally suggests a metrical form; but the poet must not be content to put bodily into rhyme the commonplaces of the street preacher, or even those of the street preacher's eloquent rival in the pulpit. He, too, with them, must work in the everyday material which is all we have, but we expect him to transmute what he uses into a finer substance. When it leaves his hand it should bear a hall-mark by which we may recognise it for a poet's utterance—and not that of preacher, moralist, essayist, or any worker in prose. Facility in composition is perhaps always to be desired for a writer, but it is not an unmixed advantage. When it induces glibness, as one fears it has done in some of these poems, one could wish that the writer had known something of the "pleasure" to be found "in poetic pains." Had the stringing of rhymes been a less easy process to Maxwell Gray, she would certainly have produced something better, in writing of "The Best Land," than the seventeen stanzas of which these two are a fair specimen:

"Tell me the sweetest, fairest spot of earth,
Tell me the land of every land most blest;
Lies it beyond the morning's rosy birth?
Lies it beyond the crimson-pillared west?"

"Smiles it upon the broad earth's burning zone, Where chilling blasts of north wind never come?
Is it some fairy isle whose sweets are blown Far over sea by zephyrs soft and dumb?"

In the rest of the poem there are allusions to "sapphire lakes," to "Adam's primal bower," to the "palmy south," "burning Ind," "thymy downs," "the daisied lea," the "hoary steeple," "twilight's dewy gloom," and the "verdant sod."

It is not a pleasant task to point out these blemishes, but they illustrate the argument that fluency does not imply fullness or finish. Perhaps they are explained by the attempt to unite the functions of romance-writer and poet. The one must be affluent of words; the other eclectic and sparing. For the former the immediate impression is everything; the latter must take care that he produces a worthy abiding impression. But taking Maxwell Gray's poems for what they are—that is to say, not as the best work she has done—they are yet good. There is scarcely one of them without some distinct merit of its own; and occasionally, as in these opening verses of "The Forest," that merit is a high one.

"Oh, let us pierce the billowy gloom
That greenly wraps the mountain-side,
The woodland, clothing crest and combe
With beauty! There white lilies bloom,
Silk-sheathed, beneath oak branches wide,
Where sunlights glide.

"A stag down you green vista fleets;
A thousand joyous insects hum;
High up, the leafy archway meets;
Tall lindens dream of summer sweets;
On deep-mossed pathways footfalls come
All hushed and dumb.

"Sweet woodruff breaks in balmy snow
Beneath the columned aisles of beech;
Their shining leaves the sunlights throw
In dimmed and broken shafts below;
I hear the nuthatch tap his breach,
And the cuckoo's speech."

GEORGE COTTERELL.

Studies in the South and West, with Comments on Canada. By Charles Dudley Warner. (Fisher Unwin.)

WHEN Mr. Charles Dudley Warner goes on his travels, he does so as a student of human life and character and not as a geographer. He is not neglectful of geographical features or of statistics; but his interest in them is in their relation to mankind. We all remember that that famous garden of his was nothing if not moral: he would not associate with any vegetable that was disreputable or had not some quality that could contribute to his moral growth. He found total depravity typified in "snake" or "devil-grass;" and "pualee"—whatever that may be—was associated in his mind with the Chinese problem. The bean seemed to him "a beautiful confiding vine," but he could not lose sight of the fact that "you never can put beans into poetry"; he learned to value frost and snow, not as a true farmer would, because they serve the earth and the fruits thereof, but because "they give the husbandman a little peace." Now, in a more serious vein, and still with the same human interest, he makes a pilgrimage through Walt Whitman's "teeming nation of nations"; and the result is, as might be expected, an instructive chronicle and criticism.

Mr. Dudley Warner graduated, long since, with honours, as a humourist—was he not one of the noble thirteen with which Mr. W. D. Howells defied the mother-country?—and the excellence of the present work is due, in no small degree, to the fact that it is written by a humourist. Not that Mr. Warner is, or tries to be, funny in the least degree; but here are many observations and comments which a careful traveller who was not a humourist would certainly have missed, and descriptions to which none but a humourist could give such point. For instance, of New Orleans he says:

"I suppose we are all wrongly made up, and have a fallen nature; else why is it that while the most thrifty, and neat, and orderly city only wins our approval, and perhaps gratifies us intellectually, such a thriftless, battered and stained and lazy old place as the French quarter of New Orleans takes our hearts?" (p. 40).

"The stranger who is accustomed to closed sewers, and to get his malaria and typhoid through pipes conducted into his house by the most approved methods of plumbing, is aghast at the spectacle of slime and filth in the streets, and wonders why the city is not in perennial epidemic; but the sun and the wind are scavengers, and the city is not nearly so unhealthy as it ought to be with such a city government as they say it endures" (pp. 40, 41).

More important still are the sympathy, the broad tolerance, and the clear insight into character which nothing but a keen sense of humour united with wise discretion can give. Mr. Dudley Warner wields the magic wand which converts dead facts into living truth.

He does not profess to have made a profound study of the social conditions of the many places which he visited, nor to treat in an exhaustive fashion of the various questions upon which he touches. "Points of great interest were," as he says, "necessarily omitted" in a tour such as his; and the work he has written is suggestive rather than conclusive. Yet it will, I believe, be increasingly recognised as a contribution of the highest order to the discussion of the social and race problems which perplex the United States.

First and foremost of these is the negro problem, which confronted Mr. Warner when he went South. Mr. Warner does not share in the melancholy anticipations which prevail in some quarters as to the future of the negro. He thinks his redemption not only possible, but rapidly bringing itself to pass:

"The negro is generally regarded as the best labourer in the world, and there is generally goodwill towards him, a desire that he shall be educated, and become thrifty. . . . The progress in education, in industry, in ability to earn money, is extraordinary—much greater than ought to have been expected in twenty years, even by their most sanguine friends, and it is greater now than at any other period" (p. 114).

Mr. Warner went among the negroes, and studied their condition and character at first hand. He asked a company of them:

"What do you want here in the way of civil rights that you have not?" The reply from one was that he got the respect of the Whites just as he was able to command it by his ability and by making money; and, with a touch of a sense of injustice, he said he had ceased to expect that the coloured race would get it in any other way. Another reply was—and this was evidently the deep feeling of all—"We want to be treated like men, like anybody else, regardless of colour. We don't mean by this social equality at all; that is a matter that regulates itself among whites and coloured people everywhere. We want the public conveyances open to us according to the fare we pay; we want privilege to go to hotels and to theatres, operas, and places of amusement. We wish you could see our families and the way we live, you would then understand that we cannot go to the places assigned us in concerts and theatres without loss of self-respect" (p. 117).

With a fair field and no favour, the outlook, as far as the character of the negro is concerned, is evidently quite hopeful; but, whatever his possibilities may be, the question still remains, can he and the white man abide together in America—not necessarily in intimate relations, but harmoniously, as befits a civilised community? The true difficulty does not lie in the character of the negro, but in the character of the Southern white. The hopes of his redemption are far from cheering. Items of news from the Southern States similar to the following are far too frequent:

"A mob of armed men forced their way into the county jail at Barnwell and shot by lynch law eight negroes, some of whom were awaiting trial for supposed complicity in a murder."

This is bad enough—to shoot men only, as yet, suspected of murder; but it is not all, for four of these eight murdered men were not even suspected, but were simply detained as witnesses. Now that the negro is no longer his slave, the Southern white, after spoiling him as a savage, is seeking to refuse him the civilisation of which he is proving himself capable, by returning him to Africa; only the idea suggests itself, not unnaturally, that the true solution of the difficulty would be to eliminate from America the really savage element by exporting the Southern white himself.

The race trouble, in a less acute form, presents itself again in relation to other foreign elements in the population. The welding process is not sufficiently rapid, even if it is taking place at all. As between North and South, so now, increasingly, between East and West, that cohesion or unity which is the safeguard of a nation is wanting. Mr. Warner regards it as "the simple truth" to say that "Comparatively few Eastern people have any adequate conception of what lies west of Chicago and St. Louis; perhaps a hazy geographical notion of it, but not the faintest idea of its civilisation and society."

It is a common remark at the West, he says, that "Eastern people know nothing about us, they think us half civilised"; and with slight irritability at this ignorance is mingled "a waxing feeling of superiority over the East in force and power."

It would seem that East and West mutually undervalue one another, partly out of ignorance, and partly out of jealousy. The rivalry between Chicago and New York, which has lately been emphasised over the question where the Exhibition of 1893 is to be held, is far from being a friendly rivalry. On this point, Mr. Warner, who is a New York man, by adoption at least, makes a confession which is not without significance. He met a lady from New Orleans who had lately visited both cities for the first time, and he asked her carelessly—not doubting her answer—which city she liked best.

"To my surprise she hesitated. This hesitation was fatal to all my pre-conceived notions. It mattered not thereafter which she preferred; she had hesitated. She was actually comparing Chicago to New York in her mind, as one might compare Paris and London. The audacity of the comparison I saw was excused by its innocence. I confess that it had never occurred to me to think of Chicago in that continental light. 'Well,' she said, not seeing at all the humour of my remark, 'Chicago seems to me to have finer buildings and residences, to be the more beautiful city; but of course there is more in New York; it is a greater city, and I should prefer to live there for what I want.' This naïve observation set me thinking; and I wondered if there was a point of view, say that of divine omniscience and fairness, in which Chicago would appear as one of the great cities of the world" (p. 178).

Of the West generally, and particularly of the state of Wisconsin, Mr. Warner has much that is good to say. In several respects—notably in the treatment of the insane—he found this state in advance of others. At Madison, which is not only an intellectual centre but an intelligent city, the book trade has troubles similar to those which British booksellers are continually setting forth in the correspondence columns of their able organ the Bookseller. The people do not support book stores; they buy their books at "variety shops." The reasons suggested for this melancholy state of things are worth attention :

"Perhaps it is true that people accustomed to newspapers full of 'selections,' to the flimsy publications found on the cheap counters, and to the magazines, do not buy 'books that are books,' except for 'furnishing'; that they depend more and more upon the circulating libraries for anything that costs more than an imported cigar or half a pound of candy. The local dealers say that the system of the great publishing houses is unsatisfactory as to prices and discounts. Private persons can get the same discounts as the dealers. . . . Another reason for the decline in the trade may be in the fact that comparatively few booksellers are men of taste in letters, men who read, or keep the run of new publications. If a retail grocer knew no more of his business than many booksellers know of theirs, he would certainly fail" (p. 174).

Yet another reason may be found in the increased facilities for travelling and transmission, which are effecting a revolution in the arrangements of all trades, by making the middleman less necessary than formerly. The country reader can visit the source of supply for himself without trouble; or, guiding himself by the literary criticisms which he finds in the Athenæum or the ACADEMY, and in the provincial daily papers of the first rank, such as the Manchester Guardian and the Scotsman, he can safely order what he wants direct from the publishers. In short, large stocks of new books are no longer needed; and the booksellers of to-day only maintain a place by giving excessive discounts—a system which, clearly enough, must soon end. Mr. Warner thinks a bookseller, if he is a man of literary culture, "can do a great deal for the cultivation of the public taste. His shop becomes a sort of intellectual centre for the town." Here and there such a bookseller is still to be found, and he is described, significantly enough, as one of the old school. The modern bookseller is not a book man but a tradesman; and even as a tradesman he is, too often, not wise—grumbling that things are no longer as they once were, instead of diligently making the most of what is.

Kentucky is not on the same intellectual level as Wisconsin. It was there that Mr. Warner met with a philosopher whose eccentricity was that "he had voted for Cleveland and should do so again." The objection to such a proceeding was that "Cleveland had had the salary long enough, and got rich enough out of it." The same philosopher had his own opinion about killing: "All this killing in the mountains is foolish. If you kill a man, that don't aggravate him; he's dead and don't care, and it all comes on you."

When we consider the race difficulties of America, it is impossible not to see the resemblance between that Union and the great German federation which has been built up in our time. In both cases the political union is composed of races, differing widely in character and temperament, with some common interests and some widely divergent ones. But there is a fundamental difference between America and Germany. America is a nation in the process of making; liberty is finding its level, rudely enough sometimes, no doubt, but subject only to experience, the natural check to its excesses, and the true safeguard which prevents liberty from ever permanently degenerating into libertinism. Germany, on the contrary, is held together by the suppression of freedom; and when the iron hand which holds it is removed, the popular forces will assert themselves and the federation may go to pieces.

Of Canada and her relation to the United States Mr. Warner has much to say that is interesting. His conclusion is that in Canada to-day there is "a growing feeling for independence; very little, taking the whole mass, for annexation." Among the objections which he thinks Canada has to the latter are a belief that Canada is better governed than the States, a dislike of too frequent elections, of sensational and irresponsible journalism, and of the want of system in the Civil Service. On the whole, we may take comfort, for there are "great commercial forces at work" which "seem strong enough to keep Canada for a long time on her present line of development in a British connection."

The Sandycroft Mystery. By T. W. Speight. (Chatto & Windus.)

HAD not "The Egoist" been a title already appropriated by Mr. George Meredith, it might have appeared most fitly as the name of Mr. Christie Murray's latest novel. As a study of perfectly developed egotism, manifesting itself first in acts of petty selfish domineering, growing into a scheme of self-aggrandisement so utterly base that he hardly dares to define it to his own mind, and culminating in an attempt at actual murder, devised with the cunning of criminal monomania rather than of ordinary scoundrelism, the character of Robert Snelling is a masterpiece which has few equals in English fiction. No special skill would have been needed for the realisable portrayal either of the Snelling whose acquaintance we make in the first volume—the cold-hearted selfishly grasping man, whose narrow brain just suffices to enable him to keep up appearances before his simple-minded neighbours—or of the moral monster whose battered corpse is dragged from the debris of the ruinous old tower which his own murderous hands have undermined. The surpassing merit of Mr. Christie Murray's creative work is observable in his record of the process of moral disintegration by which, quite naturally, and indeed inevitably, the development of law-fearing egotism into law-defying crime is made credible to the imagination. There is no per saltum movement; we are made to see every step in the downward progress, and not merely to feel that Snelling is here and that he was there, but to realise the continuity of every motion of descent. Though Mr. Christie Murray more than once refers to his principal personage as a small and provincial Napoleon, the reference is generally made with a reserve of implied intellectual disparagement; but there is really something quite Napoleonic in his power of combination, his skill in marshalling his forces, and the cool promptitude with which, when foiled for the moment by a temporary reverse, he can instantly organise a new plain of campaign. The scene in the schoolroom where he compels the schoolmaster, who has been his unconscious tool, to bear public witness to the beneficence of his intentions with regard to his ward is an exhibition of splendid strategic resources; and, indeed, there is no crisis of difficulty to the needs of which Snelling does not rise, for when he ultimately fails it is not that his wits are found wanting, but simply that he has matched them against a fate or a providence which is too strong for him. Snelling is the one personage who makes the book really noteworthy, but the other persons in the drama in which he takes the rôle of first villain are admirably cast for their respective parts. Isaiah Winter, with his cunningly unobtrusive loyalty to the poor lad John Vale, who, during the greater part of the first volume, is in such parlous case, is a portrait which Dickens would not have been ashamed to own; and very Dickens-like, without being the least imitative, is the sketch of the delightful little French household which gives refuge to John and his doughty champion William Gregg. Mr. Christie Murray has always succeeded admirably in reproducing the effectively picturesque manner of the great master without falling into any of his pet mannerisms; and in John Vale's Guardian his success is noticeably conspicuous. Both in respect of matter and style, it is one of his best books.

"Nomad's" new book, The Railway Foundling, is both much larger and much more elaborate in construction than its predecessor, The Milroys; and, so far as the latter feature is concerned, it will seem to many readers that the novel is burdened rather than brightened by the somewhat melodramatic plot which is tacked on to an otherwise simple and pleasant, though by no means faultless, story. Indeed, the chapters relating to the mystery of the parentage of that unwholesomely precocious child Annabel Westgate, which are evidently intended to provide the element of excitement, are the very chapters which will be skipped, skimmed, or at any rate read with very languid interest. The story deals mainly with the sayings, doings, and love-affairs—especially the love-affairs—of the younger members of the family of Mr. James Ellaby, who is contractor's agent for a new line of railway, and who accordingly pitches his tent in the small country town of Little Marsdon, which is midway between the two termini. The social position of a contractor's agent is, I should imagine, somewhat indefinite, depending very much upon the kind of man who occupies it; and though Mr. Ellaby is a very worthy fellow, he seems hardly the sort of man who is usually found hand and glove with countesses and county people generally. "Nomad's" particular countess is, however, a somewhat eccentric old lady, whose style of conversation—as, for example, when she speaks of herself as “tied by the leg”—indicates a frank unconventionality of nature, so she may be expected to wear her countess-ship “with a difference.” It may be noted that the conversation of all the feminine characters—even of the girls, who are supposed to be specially refined and charming—is somewhat heavily shot with slang, the expressive but not very pretty word “snaggy” being their “partikler wanity.” This and other lapses from perfect vraisemblance render it impossible to speak of The Railway Foundling in terms of unreserved praise; but it is a bright readable story, with plenty of good material, much of which is by no means unskillfully utilised.

Mr. Frank Hudson's Running Double deals with theatricals in London, with sport in Ireland, and with love-making of various kinds in both places. The writer's name has not a specially Hibernian sound, but he betrays his nationality by various little slips, as, for example, when he speaks of a London medical man as “Surgeon Thomas,” a style unknown in this country out of the army, but quite common in Ireland; or when, with characteristic national carelessness about trifles, he spells the name of the river Liffey without an “e.” He has, however, a full share of Irish liveliness, and the story is told with a brisk vivacity which is decidedly exhilarating. The chapters which take us to the Ennisbeg trout stream, to the Rathmorran racecourse, and to the Apollo Theatre, are capital examples of the “rattling” order of writing, though it would have been none the worse if Mr. Hudson had excluded from his rattle the verbatim reports of the conversation of his stage manager, which is “frequent and painful and free.” “Now, then, you blooming jossers, where the h— have you all gone to” may be realistic but it is not pretty. Though there is not very much substance in Running Double, it is very easy and entertaining reading.

In spite of the high-sounding initials on the title-page of Prince Maurice of Statland, it is hardly probable that its author is a real live royal highness; but he has an air of knowing his way about the minor European courts, and one may indulge in the guess that he is a young attaché with a small modicum of taste, a rather larger measure of literary skill, and any amount of leisure and ambition. The sickening record of intrigue to which the major part of the book is devoted certainly adds meaning and emphasis to the saying of Marcus Aurelius, that even in a palace life may be lived well; but “H. R. H.” might occasionally have taken his readers into good company without seriously impairing the flavour of his piquant narrative. Even the sweet Highland air which we breathe in the opening chapters is contaminated by the amorous prince, who in the most matter-of-course way proposes to a well-born and modest Scottish girl that she shall become his mistress; and, oddly enough, the young lady herself, though she certainly says “No” to the suggestion, does not appear to feel at all insulted, and very shortly afterwards contracts amorganatic marriage with her would-be seducer. For the record of the subsequent proceedings readers must study the book itself, though people who like pleasant society, and do not care for a story in which wholesale lying, adultery, and murder are important constituents, had better go elsewhere.

There is really very little to be said about A Queen of Roses, which is a harmless sort of story constructed on such familiar lines that by the time the reader has got to the end of the second chapter he knows quite what is awaiting him in the remaining thirteen. The village beauty of fiction has been so often wooed by the faithless young squire, and the coming heart-break is to be calculated upon with such certainty, that there is nothing left for curiosity but the question whether the cardiac fracture is to be brought about with or without any preceding impropriety. Mr. Baynton Foster chooses the latter alternative, and spares us the frequent seduction, though he spares us no other component of the oft-told tale. There is the inevitable lending of books; there is the usual despised but loyal suitor, who has the usual hostile meeting with the young squire; there is the customary discovery on the part of the latter that he must “sigh as a lover, but obey as a son” by marrying money; and there is the old, old accident which facilitates the heart-break and enables the heroine to die gracefully, forgiving her faithless lover with her last breath. The story is prettily told; but in a novel one does like to have just a suggestion of novelty.

Had Craythorne been published a few months earlier, it would have provided Mr. Andrew Lang with a number of capital illustrations for his amusing discourse on “How to fail in Literature,” for it is simply crowded with grotesque absurdities of portraiture, incident, and literary style; if, indeed, the word style be not inappropriate to an arrangement of words which is devoid alike of coherence and of grammar. When in the first paragraph we read of a village that is “lost in the vastness of its own insignificance,” we know at once the nature of the writer's feeling of the force and meaning of words; and the extent of his or her acquaintance with the elements of syntax is made manifest by a sentence on the fourth page, in which we are told that the church of this remarkable village had “a solemnity that inspired one with higher and purer thoughts than is suggested by the outside world.” The book turns out to be just the kind of work which these morceaux lead us to expect; but it is needless to prolong comment on the performance of an author to whose literary capacity one might well apply his own words concerning his imaginary village.

The Sandycroft Mystery is a shilling shocker of a very ordinary type, neither better nor worse than the majority of its numerous competitors. It is the often-told story of a murder perpetrated by an unknown criminal; and the expedients by which suspicion is made to fall successively upon no fewer than three innocent people are too clumsy to deceive the most inexperienced reader. Still, one might have duller company on a railway journey than Mr. Speight's tale, and for the rail it has clearly been written.

JAMES ASHCROFT NOBLE.

SOME BOOKS ON ECONOMICS.

Individualism: a System of Politics. By Wordsworth Donisthorpe. (Macmillan.) Mr. Donisthorpe announces in his preface that he has “deliberately adopted a tone rather polemic than apologetic, in the belief that dull and mealy-mouthed disputation is less calculated to rivet the attention and impress the memory than a more vigorous and uncompromising style of criticism.” The expectations raised by this announcement are not disappointed. Thus, the remarks on Mill's theory of capital cannot be called mealy-mouthed:

“There cannot be stronger testimony to the harmfulness of loose thought and corresponding phraseology than is afforded by the spectacle of a great logician like Mill propounding four fundamental theorems as the basis of his work, of which it must be said that the first is false, the second is false, the third non-essential, and the fourth either a truism or misleading.”

This vigorous and uncompromising style is calculated to impress very unfavourably anyone who has had much experience in reviewing economic literature. However, we must admit that here and there we have found some passages of more scientific interest than the writer's excessively confident tone would have led us to expect. Thus, on the subject of population, he has some remarks worthy of Cantillon or Cournot:

“Is it better that there should be one living being supremely happy, or a million fairly comfortable, or a thousand millions whose pains outweigh their pleasures? . . . We cannot tell. But assuming that life is worth living—as we must, if politics are worth discussing—then that social system which enables the largest population to get subsistence out of a given area is prima facie the best system . . . using the term better in the sense of ‘productive of a larger sum total of pleasure-feeling sentient beings.’ This weighing of happiness by the ton of flesh seems a coarse proceeding, but it is also the only mode of comparison available.”

Again, the distinction which is drawn between fixed and circulating capital, if not perfectly new, is doubtless original, and probably more philosophical than the received definitions.

“Those things the eventual consumption of which is essential to the creation of the required compound or new product are indicated by the term circulating; those things the eventual consumption of which is not essential but only accidental to the creation of the required compound form another class—fixed capital.”

Nor are the points at which Mr. Donisthorpe so vigorously attacks Mill unskillfully selected. The proposition that “capital is the result of saving” is one of which we should have welcomed a temperate criticism such as Wagner has offered. The proposition that demand for commodities is not demand for labour is, as Mr. Sidgwick says, the most difficult passage in Mill's treatise. What we complain of is that our author's slashing paragraphs do nothing to lessen the difficulty. He quite exaggerates the importance of the search for the definition of capital, or at least of the discovery which he himself makes. It is disclosed with solemnities worthy of the revelation of the Mosaic law.

“Suddenly the truth flashes in upon us. The connotation of capital rends its veil of mist and gloom and comes forth clear, sharply-defined and brilliant as a crystal. Once seen there is no mistaking it. ‘Capital is that the value of which is due to the value of its products.’ It is not long, it is not vague, but pithy, transparent, and to the point. . . . With this key we at once and easily unlock all difficulties.”

Now, this definition is really not a bad one, and we should have given a good mark to a candidate at an examination who had performed this piece of verbal analysis. A licentia sumpta pudenter, to use words in a new sense, will always be conceded by the reasonable critic. Mr. Donisthorpe is quite welcome to call the labourers a species of capital. But he must not suppose that his odd use of a word will avail much in recommending what purports to be a practical scheme, the so-called Labour Capitalisation. The character of this proposal may be thus indicated:

"It is clear that if, instead of accepting wages—letting themselves out for hire by the week or the hour—the workers entered into the venture as capitalists and free men, receiving, instead of a fixed wage, a certain pre-arranged percentage of the gross produce . . . the receipts of the hands would vary, like the profits of capitalists, with the success of the venture and the state of the trade. When trade was good the men would be receiving considerably more than usual. . . . When trade became depressed their share would decrease proportionately with that of the other capitalists. . . . Thus the cause of strikes would be eradicated."

It will be apparent that the new scheme has much in common with some familiar forms of co-operation—a system which Mr. Donisthorpe rejects as largely adulterated with fancy and fiction. His capacity to deal with the labour question may be inferred from the following piece of logic:

"The tendency of wages to sink to the subsistence level has been demonstrated a priori; and those who seek to disprove it by an appeal to experiment or observation are precisely in the foolish position of the squarer of the circle."

The context shows that the subsistence level is taken strictly, not merely as equivalent to the prevailing standard of comfort. However, while our author's method appears to us far from scientific, still we may acknowledge that, from a teleological point of view—to imitate his own style of criticism—he has a use. As against the extremers socialists he is often effective. Even to the judicial mind the forcible presentation of one-sided arguments by a clever advocate may be helpful. And that Mr. Donisthorpe is always in a high degree impressive, as well as amusing, we fully admit. Here is his picture of neo-Radicalism:

"By nibbling at the liberties first of one class and then of another; by violating all those rules of government the soundness of which have been demonstrated by the experience of ages; by increasing and entangling all the duties of Parliament and the executive; by loading the statute-book with long, tedious, and stupid Acts of Parliament too prolix and heterogeneous for even trained lawyers to digest; by multiplying policemen and inspectors and examiners and state officials of one sort and another, till no man can take a pinch of snuff without being asked to show his license, or chop faggots without a government certificate; by this, that, and the other readjustment of the order of nature by rule of thumb, a state of things has been brought about in which the workers of England, without being made one whit the healthier or the happier, have been reduced to the last degree of inefficiency, poverty, and dependence."

We should think that as a writer of leaders in a party newspaper our author would be very successful.

"QUESTIONS OF THE DAY SERIES."—The Public Regulation of Railways. By W. S. Dabney. (Putnam's.) The educated economist is not likely to dispute the leading principles set forth in this volume. To those who have studied the now classical writings of Messrs. Adams and Hadley—and, we may add, Prof. Seligman's excellent articles in the Political Science Quarterly—Mr. Dabney's general view of the economic aspects of the question will be acceptable. That competition between two or three railway companies tends to monopoly; that the dealings of such a monopoly are characterised by certain kinds of partiality, "classification" of goods, "discrimination" in favour of particular places, and even personal favouritism; that the first two species of preference are more beneficial than at first sight appears; while the third is wholly unjustifiable—these, it may be thought, are propositions which it was hardly necessary to demonstrate afresh. Perhaps, however, the lesson had not been so perfectly understood by the public; but that it was well to repeat it. And Mr. Dabney's conclusions, though not new, are original; independently deduced from the prime sources of information—the evidence taken by the "Cullom Committee," and similar documents. For those who have not leisure to consult those voluminous records, the concision between our author and other interpreters lends new weight to their construction of the evidence. Moreover, Mr. Dabney has drawn from sources of information which are not open to all. As chairman of the committee on railways and internal navigation in the legislature of Virginia, he has had peculiar opportunities of forming a judgment on the "commission system" as a method of preventing extortion and unjust discrimination. He gives reasons for believing that this system "has greatly mitigated the evils of railway abuses where these really exist, and has often done scarcely less good in pointing out cases where methods and practices commonly supposed to be unjustly discriminative are not really obnoxious to that charge."

The rival "cost of production system," and Mr. Hudson's extravagant proposal founded thereupon, receive their coup de grace from Mr. Dabney. A useful novelty in his treatment of the railway question is the prominence given to the legal aspect of the subject. On this topic, the English critic who is not specially conversant with American law cannot speak with equal confidence as with reference to the economic theories. However, we have little hesitation in pronouncing both parts of the work to be equally sound.

The Theory of Credit. By Henry Dunning Macleod. Vol. i. (Longmans.) Those who have studied Mr. Macleod's earlier writings will not derive much additional benefit from this latest product of his theoretical activity. Its "final utility," if we may use a technical term proper to an economical subject, is not considerable. The undoubtedly important lessons which Mr. Macleod has already taught us concerning the nature of debts are not made clearer in this new redaction. The truth which may be extracted from his paradox that "credit is capital" does not become truer by being repeated. Enough had been already given to the antiquities of the subject. Sat Priamo datum. It was not necessary to enlarge once more on the nature of mutuum, acceptilatio, and the rest. Least of all was it desirable to restate the doctrine that, if money is positive capital, credit may be termed negative capital; to reproduce the vain display of algebraic symbols, which but serves to bewilder the majority of readers, and to scandalise the few who hold with Jevons that mathematical conceptions may be usefully applied to economical science. We had hoped that the severe chastisement which our author's use of symbols provoked Cournot to administer might have had a salutary effect. In this matter some weight surely attaches to the authority of one who, whether as mathematician or economist, was excelled by few, and by none in the combination of the two sciences. But we fear that Cournot has wasted his severity on an incorrigible subject. Mr. Macleod appears to have learnt nothing and forgotten nothing.

The Welfare of the Millions. By Francis Minton. (Kegan, Paul & Co.) This is an abridgment of the treatise on Capital and Wages reviewed in the ACADEMY some months ago. Since then the author has not changed his opinion about the subject, nor we ours about his treatment of it. He still seems to us an apt student, who has acquired what may be called a saving knowledge of the first principles of economics. But these important truths do not "come mended"—like Abelard's expositions, according to the Eloisa of Pope—from Mr. Minton's pen. Thus, his somewhat truculent discourse entitled "Statistics versus Malthus" will not add much to the knowledge of well-read students: for instance, such as have mastered Prof. Marshall's Economics of Industry. Mr. Minton, advancing with his age, has discovered that "Ricardo only said half the truth" when he regarded labour as the foundation of all value. But we are not sure that our author improves upon his contemporaries, when, considering an exchange of oak and gold, he dwells upon the "social effort" which maintains the proprietary rights of the parties. His conception of the mechanism of exchange appears to us for the most part just and enlarged; but he is perhaps injudicious in showing an anxiety to identify credit with capital—a doctrine which the average Englishmen can not be expected to receive. His practical conclusions are less startling than his needlessly polemical tone might have led us to expect. The most drastic proposal is that "the laws of inheritance and bequest should be reformed so as to prevent the acquisition of large fortunes, either in land or any other property, by those who have not earned them." We do not feel that the author of this volume and its predecessor is a particularly good judge of the practical difficulties attending such a measure; or that the proposal is carried by Mr. Minton's advocacy much beyond the position in which it was left by Mill.

The Physiology of Industry, being an Exposure of Certain Fallacies in Existing Theories of Economics. By A. F. Mummery and G. A. Hobson. (John Murray.) The principal "fallacy" which these authors expose is the received principle which Mill thus states: "Saving enriches, and spending impoverishes, the community along with the individual." Messrs. Mummery and Hobson maintain the antithetical paradox that "saving does not reduce the aggregate consumed." It may be admitted, we think, that some part of Mill's theory on this subject is, as Prof. Sidgwick says, in form unsatisfactory and apt to puzzle the reflective reader. But genius of a higher order, and learning more extensive, than our authors seem to us to possess would be required to unravel the intricate questions which baffled Mill and Malthus.

Economic History and Theory. Tables and Diagrams. By Prof. James Mavor. (Edinburgh: William Brown.) There is no royal road to learning; but the arduous journey may be facilitated by the use of a superior kind of map, such as Mr. Mavor has prepared. We have been assisted in finding our way about economic literature by the charts and diagrams in which he has arranged the principal schools and doctors. The nice gradations and inter-dependence of the systems are logically exhibited. Of course it is not possible to classify ideas with botanical regularity. The subtlety of the subject-matter greatly exceeds the subtlety of human logic. The historian who traces the development of theory is always open to the objection with which, according to Herodotus, the genealogies of Hecataeus were met by the priests of Miletus. They "antigenealogised." An arrangement different from Mr. Mavor's might be adopted; but it would not be easy to find a better one.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MISS AMELIA B. EDWARDS has this week returned to her home at Westbury-on-Trym after her lecturing tour in America. That tour lasted for nearly five months, her first lecture having been delivered at New York on November 7, and her last at Orange, New Jersey, on March 28. Altogether she addressed more than 100,000 people, and travelled over about 16,000 miles of railway. As our readers know, the main subject of her lectures was Ancient Egypt; but on the occasion of her farewell at Boston, under the auspices of the New England Woman's Press Association, she returned to a former love and spoke on "The Art of the Novelist." After the conclusion of this lecture she was presented with a bracelet of purely American manufacture. It consists of a broad and heavy band of Californian gold, set with two large tourmalines—a ruby and an emerald—of very fine colour, the one found in Maine, the other in North Carolina. Inside it is engraved with the following inscription:—"Amelia B. Edwards, from grateful and loving friends—the women of Boston."

EARLY in the autumn, Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co. will publish a Life of Mrs. Carlyle, by Mrs. Alexander Ireland, containing several original letters—some of them in facsimile—which have never before been published. Since the Memorials were brought out by Mr. Froude, other very valuable matter has appeared, throwing additional light on the character of Mrs. Carlyle, and rendering it desirable that her life should be written. Mrs. Ireland has had the assistance and co-operation of many friends who are interested in Mrs. Carlyle's history.

THE next volume in the series of "Great Writers"—which is not, however, to be published till June—will be Lord Byron, by the Hon. Roden Noel.

THE Palestine Exploration Fund will issue this month, through Mr. A. P. Watt, a work entitled Palestine under the Moslems, by Mr. Guy le Strange. The aim of the author has been to present to the reader unacquainted with Arabic the various Moslem accounts of Palestine and the Holy Places which, beginning in the middle of the ninth century, reach in unbroken succession down to the close of the fifteenth century of our era.

MESSRS. METHUEN will shortly publish An Industrial History of England, by Mr. H. de B. Gibbins, with maps of England at various periods, representing the distribution of population, manufactures, &c. This volume will form the first of a series which Messrs. Methuen have in hand of handbooks on historical, literary, and economic subjects, designed to meet the wants of University Extension students and Home Reading Circles.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD will publish immediately Egyptian Sketches, being a record of several months' residence in Egypt last winter, by Mr. J. Lynch, formerly president of the Californian Geographical Society and member of the State senate. The book will be fully illustrated.

MR. SPENCER BLACKETT will publish immediately A Scarlet Sin, in two volumes, by Florence Marryat; and also a cheap edition of Mr. Baring Gould's The Pennycomequicks.

MR. GEORGE ALLEN will publish on April 23, a new novel by Blanche Atkinson, author of "The Web of Life."

MR. CYRIL BENNETT, author of "The Massage Case," has just completed a work giving some of his own reminiscences and experiences for the benefit of "sufferers from nerves." The title of the book is The Modern Malady, and it will be published immediately by Mr. Edward Arnold.

THE eighth volume of Mr. Horace Howard Furness's Variorum Shakspeare, containing "As You Like It," will be published at the end of this month by Messrs. Lippincott, of Philadelphia.

MR. HOUGHTON SPENCER, of Corfe, Taunton, has now ready for issue to subscribers his transcript of the register of the parish of Wilton. The original register book covers the period from 1558 to 1714; and to this have been added the modern entries down to 1837, forming a volume of 343 pages.

A NEW studio for the students of the Ladies' Department of King's College, at 13, Kensington-square, will be opened on April 21. There will also be special courses this term by Prof. Hales on "Shakspeare's Tragedies"; by Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse on "Schools of Art in the National Gallery"; and by Mr. Armbruster on "Wagner's Tristan and Isolde and Parsifal."

THE Hon. G. C. Brodrick will begin a course of three lectures at the Royal Institution on "The Place of Oxford University in English History," on Tuesday next, April 15; Prof. C. V. Boys will begin a course of three lectures on "The Heat of the Moon and Stars" on Thursday next, April 9; and Capt. Abney will begin a course of three lectures on "Colour and its Chemical Action" on Saturday next, April 19. The evening meeting will be resumed on Friday next, April 18, when Sir Frederick Bramwell will give a discourse on "Welding by Electricity."

At the next meeting of the Library Association, to be held at the new Rooms of the Association, No. 20, Hanover-square, on Monday next, April 14, at 8 p.m., Sir John Lubbock's Bill for amending the Public Libraries Acts will be discussed.

THE Académie Française has awarded a prize of 400 francs (£16) to M. Félix Rabbe for his translation of Marlowe (Paris: Albert Savine). M. Rabbe is already known in England by his translation of Shelley. The former, like the latter, is entirely in prose, including prose versions of "Hero and Leander" and "The Passionate Pilgrim." But the work, which forms two volumes, at the moderate price of seven francs, is more than a translation. Besides a preface by M. Richepin, it also contains an introduction, eighty-eight pages in length, upon the life and works of Marlowe, in which M. Rabbe shows himself to be fully acquainted with the latest English literature on the subject; and the same may be seen in the numerous notes. Apart from a few pardonable misprints, it is altogether a very scholarly book, worthy to be compared with M. James Darmesteter's popular sketch of Shakspeare in French.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK has just issued the third volume of Book-Prices Current, covering the period from December 1888 to November 1889; though why the calendar year should not be adopted we fail to understand. It is pleasant to believe that compiler and publisher have received encouragement to continue their enterprise, which must become more and more valuable as years roll on. The sales here recorded were not of a very exceptional character. The most notable was that of the Perkins Library, famous for its quartos, which realised altogether £8222 for 2086 lots. It was here that Mr. Quaritch paid £415 for the first folio of Shakspeare, £225 for the quarto of "Henry IV., Part ii.," £164 for the quarto of "Romeo and Juliet," and £130 for the quarto of "Othello." The same buyer gave £2000 for the Mentz Bible in Lord Hopetoun's sale, and £650, £470, £365, and £195 for four Caxtons belonging to the Duke of Buccleuch. The highest average of prices seems to have been reached by the second portion of the Earl of Crawford's library—£7734 for 1105 lots; but the sale which most clearly attested the modern phase of bibliomania was that of Mr. J. M. Mackenzie, of Edinburgh, who had had his first editions of Dickens so carefully illustrated and bound that Sketches by Boz fetched £30, and Pickwick £22, while choice Cruikshanks realised even more.

A LONG memorial sketch of Prof. Delitzsch, signed by Prof. Cheyne, appears in this week's Guardian; and a review of the late professor's collected popular essays (Iris: Studies in Colour and Talks about Flowers) by Graf Baudissin of Marburg University, in the Theologisch Literaturzeitung for April 5. Interwoven with the latter there is a delicate character-sketch of Prof. Delitzsch, to whom Graf Baudissin was closely attached since his student days. Both the German and the English notices refer to the fascinating combination of qualities in the richly gifted Hebraist and theologian who has passed away. We observe with regret that the Rev. A. Cousin, the highly accomplished translator of Delitzsch's Iris (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark), has himself been removed by death within the last few weeks.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

JUPITER EXILED.

He sits amid the dreamland of the snow,
In lonely desolation; far and near Lie barren bluffs of moorland, white as Fear
And cheerless as Despair. No breezes blow
With song of birds or gentle river-flow,
But the old deity's desponding ear
Hears only murmurs of the norland drear,
And moans from that far land of long ago.
O God unsphered, forsaken—as thou erst Hadst hurled old Saturn from his throne supreme,
So now a new light o'er the world has burst,
And neither force nor beauty do we deem Divine, but parts of that which is the first—
Eternal Love, a God and not a dream.

OBITUARY.

HENRY CAMPKIN.

MR. HENRY CAMPKIN, F.S.A., well known as the librarian of the collection of books belonging to the Reform Club, died at 112, Torrington Avenue, Camden Town, on April 6, aged seventy-four. For many years he devoted himself energetically to the duties of his position, and paid particular attention to the departments of typographical and historical literature, for which the library is now especially famous. In 1879 he was stricken with a serious illness, and since then his days have been passed in retirement, in the possession of a handsome pension from the club funds.

Mr. Campkin was imbued with poetic feeling; and his little volume of Peter Little, or the Lucky Sixpence, a verse book for his children, which was originally published by Ridgway in 1851, passed into a fourth edition in 1861. An earlier poem of his composition was entitled Lord Clifford's Bridal, a Metrical Tale (1838). As an archaeologist Mr. Campkin was especially attached to the history of Sussex, and he did not shrink from the dull task of drawing up an index to the first twenty-five volumes of the archaeological collections of that county. Two of its leading antiquaries, William Durrant Cooper and Mark Antony Lower, were his zealous friends; and the melancholy duty devolved on him of writing their memoirs, which were struck off for private circulation in 1877.

Mortimer Collins and he were associated together in the closest bonds of friendship, both literary and personal. There is frequent mention of Mr. Campkin in Mortimer Collins, His Letters and Friendships, by his widow; and to him, as poet and archaeologist, "Miranda, a Midsummer Madness" was dedicated by Collins. By a sad and strange coincidence the only son of Mr. Campkin died of heart disease at the precise hour when Mr. Collins was being buried, and the father, unconscious of his loss, was standing by the open grave of his friend.

MARY LOUISA BOYLE.

Miss Mary Louisa Boyle died at Oakley-street, Chelsea, on April 7, age 79. She was the younger daughter of Vice-Admiral Sir Courtenay Boyle, and her eldest sister was Maid of Honour to Queen Adelaide. Her family had many relationships in the ranks of the peerage, and her rooms at 22, South Audley-street were often crowded by persons of the highest rank, drawn thither by her talents and agreeable disposition, as much as by the ties of family connexion. A year or so ago Miss Boyle underwent an operation for cataract, and she ardently anticipated the time when her recovery would enable her to pursue with fresh vigour her wonted studies. Few persons have been more warmly welcomed into London society, and few have paid more visits to the country houses of the upper classes. She interested herself in all the associations of English life, and was steeped in the knowledge of portrait painting in this country. Two volumes of biographical illustrations of this character were compiled by her. One dealt with Lord Bath's portraits of Longleat (1881), and the other with Lord Cowper's paintings at Panshanger (1885). Many years since she published The Forester (1839), a tale dealing with the revolution of 1688; and The State Prisoner (1837), which related to the time of the French regency. Among Miss Boyle's other compositions were the Bridal of Melcha (1844), a dramatic sketch in verse; and Woodland Gossip (1864), which was a "free-and-easy translation from the German," and was accompanied by sketches drawn by some of her friends among the aristocracy. Miss Boyle's death will be much regretted.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for April opens with a plea (by Mr. Stalker) for a new orthodox theology which shall take account of new facts in various departments. The paper is stimulating, though the writer's impression that no work to speak of has been done by religious-minded English as well as German workers will not be shared by many students. We do not want a fresh development of insularity and provincialism. "Independent British" work is as much to be deprecated as "independent French" or "independent German" work. There can be but one critical theology, though there may be various dogmatic and apologetic systems. M. Renan, in a fine peroration, exhorts himself and his hearers never to say "notre science." Dr. Cox on the Function of Trial, Dr. Plummer's further recollections of Döllinger, and M. Godet on the logical arrangement of Rom. v. 15-17, will be read with interest. Prof. Margoliouth's additional specimens of the results of his comparative study of the Greek and Syriac versions of Ecclesiastical supply what many readers of his brilliant, but provoking, Inaugural Lecture must have desired. It is deeply to be regretted that this has taken the form of a reply to criticisms. The tone is one that it is difficult to characterize, and the only justification offered is that "the real question at issue" is "the truth of revelation" (p. 296). The representations given of views in the least adverse to the author's need rather careful testing; even "the lamented Prof. Delitzsch" would hardly have accepted the implied assertion (p. 297) that he agreed with the view given as Zunz's by the author. Dr. Hatch, too, is not quite properly treated; and we say nothing of still living writers. The purely linguistic matter is as valuable and suggestive as Prof. Margoliouth's criticisms anticipated. The theses attached to it and the rest of the preliminary matter would have been better away. It may be as well to add that the statement on p. 300, "and yet we are told that Koheleth and Ben-Sira are contemporaries," is considerably wide of the mark so far as Prof. Margoliouth's critics are concerned.

NEWLY DISCOVERED MSS. OF GIOR-DANO BRUNO.

SOME remarkable discoveries concerning Giordano Bruno have been made by Dr. Remigius Stölzle, professor of philosophy at Würzburg.

In the town library of Augsburg he has found a MS. of the Liber (or, more correctly, Lampas) Triginta Statuarum. In compliance with a suggestion of Prof. Stölzle, this MS., which is more complete and more correct than the Moscow one, has been sent to the editors of the works of Giordano Bruno, Messrs. Tocco and Vitelli, and will be printed in the volume containing the Inedita.

Again, in the university library of Erlangen, Prof. Stölzle has discovered two MSS. (Nos. 1215 and 1279) containing commentaries, by Jordanus Brunus Nolanus, upon Aristotelian works on physical and meteorological science. From the word "Camaracensis" (in No. 1279) it appears that these notes were made in the Cambrai College at Paris—whether during the first or the second sojourn of Bruno at Paris it is at present impossible to decide. The commentaries are in the main short expositions of the Aristotelian books in question; but, in some cases, Bruno, thinking that Aristotle had not gone deeply enough into natural philosophy, advocates the views of Empedokles and Demokritos. No. 1279 is written by Hieronymus Bealer, as Prof. Stölzle can prove from letters and other writings of Bealer which he has found at Erlangen. The writer is unknown of No. 1215. Both MSS. are copies of what Bruno had composed. No. 1279 further contains Bruno's Magia Physica and his theses thereto.

Finally, Prof. Stölzle has found two letters of Bealer, containing curious details, apparently referring to Bruno's farewell to the Academy of Helmstadt, his visit to Wolfenbüttel, his studies in medicine, and the printing of some work of his at Magdeburg. All these documents will be published by Messrs. Tocco and Vitelli.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN DANTE AND BEATRICE.

Highgate: March 14, 1890.

In view of the coming celebration at Florence of the sixth centenary of Dante's Beatrice, it may be interesting to offer a few remarks on the relation to each other of those two principal characters in the Vita Nuova and the Divina Commedia.

In 1858 the Germans proposed to hold in the following year a centenary festival in honour of Schiller. This stimulated the Italians to propose a similar festival in honour of Dante. But Dr. Barlow pointed out that the year 1859 had no correspondence with Dante's birth or death, or any memorable event in his life; but that the year 1865 would be most appropriate, that year being the sixth centenary from his birth. This suggestion was immediately adopted, and all Italy prepared itself to make ready a festival that would really do honour to the memory of their greatest national poet.

The Italians are now preparing to hold another sixth centenary festival in honour of Dante's Beatrice, and the spirit in which it will be held may be gathered from the inscription on the Portinari House, during the festival of 1865. It ran as follows:—

"O voi che per la via d' amor passate
Volgete uno sguardo alle mura
Ove nacque nell' aprile del 1266.
Beatrice Portinari
Prima e purissima fiamma
Che accese il genio
Del Divino Poeta
Dante Alighieri."

We learn from the programme, published a few weeks ago in the ACADEMY, that it is intended to treat the Beatrice of the Vita and of the Commedia as a type of modern womanhood in general, and of Italian womanhood in particular: it being assumed that she was "in herself a model among women of their highest attainments in beauty, purity, and sagacity." In illustration of this view, there is to be a series of prize essays by Italian women on the chief points of contrast between real and ideal womanhood.

There are other proposals for making the festival attractive which need not be noticed here. What I wish to point out is what seems to me to be the real interpretation of the Vita Nuova; and this leads me to object to a recent statement, that it is "the most perfect of love-tales that ever was written," and that Beatrice Portinari inspired Dante to "picture so poetically the simplicity, the nobility, the rapture of love."

Having been Barlow Lecturer at University College in 1878 and the two following years, I had no hesitation in adopting Dr. Barlow's theory—derived from the older commentators, Benvenuto da Imola, &c.—that the Beatrice of the Vita and of the Commedia represents the Divine Wisdom of the Old Testament, as set forth in many striking passages in Job, Proverbs, the Book of Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus. Dr. Barlow says:

"Dante depicts Divine Wisdom in a visible female form, the most lovely his imagination could devise, following the example of Scripture, in which her beauty and influence are justly exalted above all created things." (Contributions to the "Study of the Divina Commedia," 1864.)

In the second Canto of the Inferno, Beatrice is addressed as the true praise of God (Beatrice, loda di Dio vera!) and Virgil says that through her alone the human race exelleth. In the Purgatorio she is addressed as the light and glory of the human race. In the Paradiso her mouth is described as the fount whence springs all truth. Indeed, throughout, Dante addresses Beatrice in language that could never be used towards any mere mortal woman, however distinguished for her Christian graces.

So long as Beatrice (that is, one who blesses) is regarded as a woman, or a type of womanhood, and the Vita Nuova as a love-story, Dante is, to my mind, simply unintelligible; but if we regard the Vita as an allegory in the sense that the Pilgrim's Progress is such, then it is not only intelligible in itself, but it becomes a fitting introduction to the grandest poem that has appeared in any modern language.

If the following passage be read as part of a love-story, its language is inflated and its statements become simply impossible; but if as an allegorical representation of Divine Wisdom walking the earth, it is full of poetical truth; for who could look upon her and not sigh to possess her, or even to win her smile?

"That most lovely lady rose so high in the estimation of others, that as she walked along the streets people ran to get a sight of her, which circumstance occasioned me wonderful delight; and such modesty came over the heart of him who chanced to be near her, that he did neither dare to raise his eyes nor to return her salutation. If any be incredulous, there are many who, by their own experience, are able to testify to the truth of this matter. She moved along, crowned and adorned with humility, exhibiting no pride on account of those things which she both saw and heard. Many, indeed, when she had passed, would say: 'This is not a woman, but one of the beautiful angels of Heaven!' Others said: 'She is a miracle! blessed be the Lord who is able to perform so admirable a work!' I say, then, she was of so noble a presence, so abounding in every charm, that those who looked upon her felt within them so chaste, so gentle a sense of pleasure, that they were incapable of describing it. Nor was there any one that had the opportunity of seeing her who did not instantly feel compelled to sigh. These and other extraordinary effects were produced by her actually and miraculously; wherefore reflecting on all this . . . I made this sonnet:

"When she, my Lady, greets folk with "Good-day,"

Such candour and such gentleness combine,
That tongues grow tremulous and speech resign,

And to look on her no one dares essay.

She feels men's praises as she goes her way,
In meekness clad, an influence benign;
You fancy she must be a thing divine,
Come down from heaven a marvel to display.

Her presence is so pleasant to the eye
That through the eye the heart with sweetness glows;

To understand it you its power must prove;
And from those lips an influence seems to move,

So sweet and full of love, it overflows,
And goes on saying to our spirits, "Sigh!"

As in allegorical treatment there is often a fusion of the real with the ideal, so the boy Dante may have been struck with the name and the appearance of Beatrice Portinari; and when as a man of twenty-five, or, as some say, twenty-eight or twenty-nine, he composed the Vita Nuova, he made Beatrice the heroine, but not the Portinari; for, as he tells us at the very beginning of his work, "by many she was called Beatrice who knew her by no other name." They who knew of Divine Wisdom would only know of Beatrice as the one who blesses. It may be added that throughout the Vita there is not the most distant allusion to love-making, or courting, or even of speaking to the beloved object. Dante declares that his only object in seeking Beatrice was to hear her voice, and to be recognised and publicly saluted by her. Certainly no young lady would be satisfied with such a lover; and that Beatrice Portinari was not may be inferred from her conduct in marrying another, at the time when Dante was probably engaged to his future wife, Gemma di Manetto, the mother of his six children.

As the Beatrice of the Vita is Divine Wisdom, so in the Convito, a later work, Beatrice becomes Philosophy; and Philosophy Dante declares to be a loving use of Wisdom (Filosofia è uno amoroso uso di sapienza il quale massimamente è in Dio), and the food that it supplies is the pan degli angeli, the angels' food, which he so earnestly longed for. And here may be cited one of the many examples of the mingling of the real with the ideal, which have misled some in the belief that Dante was writing a personal narrative and not an allegory. He says:—"O, how many nights there were, while the eyes of others were closed in sleep, my eyes were fixed on the abode of my love!" Now curious observers have made the discovery that from the window of Dante's bedchamber the house of Portinari could be seen; and hence it was supposed that the poet was so insane as to sit up night after night to gaze upon it, whereas the allegory simply means that he often sat up all night to study philosophy.

But the Beatrice of the Vita and of the Commedia must be regarded as the same idealised being who was spiritually united with Dante, and was constantly raising up new thoughts within him; and the very sight of her made him and others wiser and better. If the character of Beatrice has been mistaken, that of her companions has also been misunderstood. Even a writer so well versed in Italian literature as Mr. Symonds regards the Vita as "a personal confidence," "an exaltation of womanhood." "It is enough for the young Dante to meet Beatrice, to pass her among her maidens in the city ways, to receive her salute, to admire her moving through the many-coloured crowd, to meditate upon her apparition as one of God's angels in the solitude of his chamber." (Renaissance in Italy. Italian Literature, 1881.)

Now the maidens thus referred to as the companions of Beatrice are the Cardinal or Moral Virtues, as indicated in the Book of Wisdom, viii. 7. "She [i.e. Wisdom] teacheth Temperance and Prudence, Justice and Fortitude." They were assigned to Beatrice as her handmaids in heaven, as in Purg. xxxi. 106.

"We here are nymphs, and in the heaven are stars;

Ere Beatrice descended to the world,
We as her handmaids were appointed her."

The three theological or Christian virtues, Faith, Hope, and Charity, were also companions of Beatrice; but the greatest of these, according to the revised version, 1 Cor. xiii. 13, "is Love." In the following sonnet we see Beatrice surrounded by some of her companions:—

"It was on All Saints' Day that's just gone by,
I saw some Ladies pass, a gentle band,
And she who chief seemed of that company
Came forward, leading Love on her right hand.

Her eyes shone forth with so much brilliancy,
As of a spirit from celestial land;
And as I gazed with more persistency,
An angel seemed before my sight to stand.

On him who's worthy, meekly she bestowed
Her salutation, with a look benign;
So that his heart with goodness overflowed;

She surely comes from heaven—a thing divine,
And for our good on earth has her abode;
So blest is he who near her may remain."

When Beatrice is here described as leading Love on her right hand, it is not the Eros of the Greek mythology, but the greatest of the Christian virtues. Dante's ideal was so exalted that the Love that appeared to him in the vision and is here led by Divine Wisdom is the Spirit of Holiness, or even the Holy Spirit, or, as our poet says in another place, "our Lord's name, which is Love."

It would be easy to quote numerous passages in praise of Wisdom and her attributes that are to be found in the Old Testament, and place them side by side with passages from the Vita and the Commedia; but this would occupy too much space. I, therefore, conclude with a few remarks on the marvellous vision above referred to, in which Dante describes Love appearing to him with the poet's heart in his hand, and on his arm Beatrice asleep, wrapped in a mantle. Love awakened her, and gave her Dante's heart to eat, and then ascended with her on high. All this points to Divine Wisdom, steeped in the sleep of mortal life; the mantle round her her temporary embodiment; Divine Wisdom, by eating, absorbed his life into her own, so that henceforth he lived in her, and, as described in the Paradiso, he lives on her looks, her words, her smiles. In the Book of Wisdom it is declared (vii. 28) that "God loveth none but him that dwelleth with wisdom." Hence Dante, forsaking Beatrice, fell under the divine displeasure. "So low he fell," says Beatrice in the Purgatorio:

"So low he fell that all appliances
For his salvation were already short,
Save showing him the people of perdition.
For this I visited the gates of death,
And unto him, who so far up has led him,
My intercessions were with weeping borne."

In other words, Divine Wisdom, contemplating a soul that had gone astray, recovered him by making him feel the horrors of Hell, the purifying influences of Purgatory, and the complete happiness of Paradise.

O. TOMLINSON.

THE VERB "MEAN," TO MOAN.

Cambridge: April 6, 1890.

There is an interesting example of the verb mean, to moan, in Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," v. 330:

"And thus she means, videlicet," &c.

It was changed to moans by Theobald; but, as Staunton remarks, unnecessarily. It answers to the A.S. mānan, verb, derived from mān, sb., a lament. It is precisely parallel to heal from whole (more correctly hole); yet it has now gone out of use. In the same way the verb to deem is sometimes supplanted by the verb to doom, which was not originally a verbal form.

I have been reminded of this (which I have noted once before) by the following example, written by King James I. long before his son Charles came to the throne:

"Whereby the contrarie, a Tyrannes miserable and infamous life, armeth in end his owne subjects to be his burreaux [executioners]: and although that rebellion be euer vnlawfull on their part, yet is the world so wearied of him, that his fall is little meant by the rest of his subjects, and but smyled at by his neighbours."—Basilikon Doron, book ii., § 2.

It is clear that the A.S. sb. mān, a lament, must have existed, but I am as far as ever from finding an example of it.

GEORGE ELIOT: A CORRECTION.

King's College, Cambridge: April 1, 1890.

Your very sympathetic review of my Life of George Eliot encourages me to ask you to make a correction in my book.

I stated that, when she had a cast taken of her head, it was shaved for the purpose. I made this statement on what appeared to me very good authority—from a friend of the Brays who had seen the cast. I now learn, on better authority, that the hair was not cut or shaved off, but only smoothed.

OSCAR BROWNING.

CHAUCER'S STORY OF "THE MAD COW."

London: April 3, 1890.

As pointed out in the Royal Asiatic Society's Journal for this month, the oldest version of the story of "The Husband and the Parrot," referred to by Prof. Skeat in the ACADEMY of April 5, is the Suka Jataka, which is given in two forms in the old Buddhist Collection.

SCIENCE.

THE STUDY OF LATIN IN THE TWELFTH CENTURY.

Conradi Hirsaugensis Dialogus super Auctores suos Didascalon. Eine Literaturgeschichte aus dem XII. Jahrhundert erstmals herausgegeben von Dr. G. Schepss. (Würzburg.)

THE author of this hitherto unedited treatise is mentioned by Trithemius, the historian of Hirschau, as a monk of the Benedictine Abbey of Hirschau, in Würtemberg,

"a man most erudite in the holy scriptures, and of great skill in secular literature, a philosopher, rhetorician, musician, and poet of mark. Under the name of Peregrinus, he composed many admirable works, in which the ornate arrangement of the sentences and the fine polish of the language declares their author to be second to none of the ancients."

He lived under Abbot Gebhard (1091-1105) and his successors Bruno and Volmar (1105-1157), was for many years at the head of the monastery school at Hirschau, and trained many eminent pupils. He died at the age of eighty.

The Dialogus super Auctores is a short colloquy, extending to sixty-three octavo pages in rather small type, on the Roman writers then habitually read. The list as given at the end of Herr Schepss' edition, is as follows: Aesopus, Arator, Avianus, Boethius, Cato, Cicero, Donatus, Homerus, Horatius, Iuvenius, Lucanus, Ovidius, Persius, Prosper, Prudentius, Sallustius, Sedulius, Statius, Vergilius. To these must be added Theodolus, who, however, belongs to a much later period. By Homer is meant the Latin hexameter poem, containing part of the narrative of the Iliad, sometimes known as Pindarus Thebanus. Conrad explains (p. 46) that he has confined his remarks to a comparatively select number of writers, because many historians, and writers of tragedy and comedy, as well as musici (writers on music or lyric poets?) that had once been read, had fallen out of use from their profane and secular character. As might be inferred from this, his standpoint is too distinctly clerical to be very interesting; and his notices are, for the same reason, apt to be fuller in proportion to the Christian character of the writer passed under review. Thus Arator and Prudentius each have two pages and some biographical details allowed them; whereas Ovid, the numerous MSS. of whose poems prove how widely he was read in the Middle Ages, is dismissed with the remark that, although he was endurable in some of his minor poems, the "Fasti," the "Epistles from Pontus," the "Nux," and some others, he could not be tolerated in his love poems or the shocking extravagances of his "Heroides" by any sane man. And Conrad proceeds to condemn the "Metamorphoses" as idolatrous—a charge which can hardly be said to lie on the surface of that famous work. Speaking of Terence, whom he has just before been defending on the ground that St. Paul had introduced "evil communications corrupt good manners" from Menander into one of his Epistles, he tells us that when the words "ne quid nimis" were recited in the theatre by Calliopius, they were unanimously applauded! Juvenal's excellence as a satirist is illustrated by two extracts—"Si capiti bene sit lateri pedibusque quid ultra Diuitiae poterunt regales addere maius," and "Et nihil est sacrum nisi quod Libitina sacrauit"—each of them slightly altered, not from Juvenal, but Horace. The Latin hexameter paraphrase of the Iliad was translated from the Greek of Homer by Pindar, a philosopher of the most approved excellence. To the fables of Avianus two pages are devoted; but, as if to show how little he had really studied them, he changes the tortoise of the second fable into a snail. More interesting is his remark that these fables were composed in hexameters and pentameters to be useful in the education of boys; and—what seems to have struck him particularly—that the scope of each fable was stated either at the beginning or end of it. His words here might seem to imply that he had found such a moral attached to every one of the fables; but we must not be too exacting on his recollection, and it is more probable that he speaks of what is generally true.

It is not a little disappointing to find a writer who was not afraid to write a dialogue on the chief writers of Rome then read, performing his task so very feebly; and it is more astonishing from the occasional glimpses of exacter training which are sometimes traceable. Criticising a verse of Theodolus—

"Vis et Troianum lauderis scire secretum"— he remarks: "Some think Theodolus made a false quantity, but it is far more credible that it is an error of the copyist, who substituted secretum for sacratum; for the sacratum of the Trojans was the Palladium, and the most secret thing would therefore be the most hallowed." Here Conrad evinces the true sagacity of conjectural emendation. Whether his divination be right or—as Herr Schepss thinks—wrong, it is something to find in a German monastery of the twelfth century the germs of one, and not the least important, branch of modern philological criticism.

ROBINSON ELLIS.

CURRENT SCIENTIFIC LITERATURE.

Index of British Plants. By R. Turnbull. (Bell.) The purpose of Mr. Turnbull's labours has been to furnish a complete list of names and synonyms for British plants, with references to the London Catalogue and to the corresponding numbers of the plates in Symes's English Botany (third edition) and to Fitch's and Smith's Illustrations of Bentham's British Flora. The book cannot fail to be useful, if only because of the many changes of name for our native species which have been made or are likely to be made. Indeed, it is somewhat in advance of the eighth edition of the London Catalogue in changing names to suit the newest investigations. The whole of the work seems carefully done. And we can only suggest as possible improvements that some indication should be given whether the aliens which are mentioned (as Plantago arenaria) have been found often or in many stations; and that the growing rarity or actual extinction of certain species should be pointed out. As the number of counties or vice-counties in which British species now occur is given, it would be well for the reader to know whether the number was ever larger. Sisymbrium Irio is returned for one county, but it was formerly far commoner. Eriophorum alpinum is returned for two counties, while Dr. Hooker (in his edition of Bentham) gives it up as already extinct.

Science and Scientists: Some Papers on Natural History. By Rev. J. Gerard, S.J. (Catholic Truth Society.) After a preliminary grumble at the un-English word "scientist" (Why not "scientific man"?), and at another monstrosity in Mr. Gerard's pages, "purposive," it may be noted that these half-dozen essays are an attack upon Darwinism. The master, however, is only indirectly assailed. The wide generalisations of Mr. Grant Allen chiefly elicit the author's criticism. The enthusiasm of converts is ever excessive; and Mr. Grant Allen's account of the common arum, or his statement that "the whole loveliness of flowers is dependent upon all kinds of accidental causes," may reasonably be controverted by careful observers of nature. Of course the latter statement involves the entire question of design and beauty in nature. These points concern final causes, many of which can only be surmised; but such assaults on particular out-works of the Darwinian theory show that it is not so formidable a fortress, or one so capable of throwing its aegis over all animated nature, as its defenders suppose. Opponents hold that no historical instance of interchange of species has yet been pointed out, and insist (rightly, as would be held in other subjects) that hypothetical premises cannot lead to positive conclusions. Besides which, particular instances have ever been the difficulty of the whole theory. It may reasonably be allowed, however, that there is much in it which is strongly suggestive and useful as a hypothesis to explain facts. Above all, naturalists, whether of the old-fashioned or the modern belief, will ever feel grateful to Darwin for his careful experiments. Father Gerard, however, is not satisfied with this, and boldly presses the theory at all points, often with much success. Many of his examples are striking, and will interest country dwellers, who fancy they know a good deal about nature. The author's chapter on birds shows that he is abreast of the latest discoveries in migration. Altogether, the book is written with considerable acuteness and a large choice of examples, and will well repay perusal.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE publications of the Pali Text Society for its ninth year—the Digha, by Prof. Rhys Davids and Mr. Carpenter; the Peta Vatthu, by Prof. Minayeff; and the usual Journal—are now being issued to subscribers. Those of the tenth year are well advanced; Prof. Windisch's Itivuttaka is already printed, and the third volume of M. Léon Keer's Samyutta is nearly through the press.

WE have received a supplement to the American Journal of Philology, containing an index to the first ten volumes of that periodical, compiled by Dr. W. Muss-Arnolt. It fills forty-four pages, closely printed in double columns; and it is worthy of notice, not only for its extreme minuteness, but also for the principle on which it is arranged—a principle borrowed, we believe, from the "P. Q." Indexes of Mr. Griswold. First come the names of the contributors, 136 in number (among whom Prof. Gildersleeve is conspicuous), with a reference to their contributions marked as article, correspondence, note, report, or review. Each contributor has a number, in bold numerals, by which his contributions can be identified in the index of subjects. This is so full as to be practically exhaustive. For example, under Greek, we have—first, the subjects that have been treated of, from accents to verbs; then, all the Greek etymologies that have been proposed or criticised; and, lastly, all the Greek words and forms that have been commented on. So, again, under Reports and Reviews, the title of every serial publication and the name of every author is given in alphabetical order. It is needless to add that such a work as this must be simply invaluable to the philologist. It is as much superior to anything of the kind that has been done in England as the American Journal of Philology is to our cognate periodicals.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—(Friday, March 21.)

PROF. SKRAT in the chair.—Prince L.-L. Bonaparte's paper on "Albanian, Modern Greek, Gallo-Italic, Provençal, and Illyrian, still in use as Linguistic Islands in the Neapolitan and Sicilian Provinces of Italy," was, in his absence (through indisposition), read by Mr. Alex. J. Ellis. Albanian had been introduced by Scanderbeg and his followers in the fifteenth century, and was still found in fifty-five places in the provinces of Teramo, Campobasso, Foggia, Potenza, Lecce, Cosenza (principally), Catanzaro, and Palermo. A list of all the places obtained in recent researches, and illustrated by specially engraved maps of the districts, was furnished. A list of 199 Albanian words obtained from Padre de Vincentis, Signor C. Santoro, and the late Dr. Hanusz, was furnished, together with phrases and examples, in a phonetic orthography, &c., and fourteen versions of the Lord's Prayer, as well as Papanti's specimen. Modern Greek, which was not a descendant of the Greek anciently spoken in Southern Italy, known as Magna Graecia, but was an importation from Modern Greece, and is much Italianised, occurs in twenty-six places, all specified, in the provinces of Lecce and Reggio di Calabria. Gallo-Italic descends from the Waldensian Piedmontese of Pinerolo, near Turin—the emigration having occurred in the fourteenth century. It is still heard in seven places, specified, in the provinces of Cosenza, Messina, Catania, and Caltanissetta. Provençal is heard only in two places, specified, in the province of Foggia. Illyrian, due to an emigration from Dalmatia in the sixteenth century, exists in three places, specified, in the province of Campobasso. This paper is the result of researches made during two recent visits to Italy, assisted by many local ecclesiastics.—Mr. Ellis afterwards gave an account of Mr. Horatio Hale's researches on the Chinook jargon used as the trade language in the Oregon districts, Upper Canada.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—(Thursday, March 27.)

DR. JOHN EVANS, President, in the chair.—Mr. Arthur J. Evans read a paper on "A Late Celtic Cemetery at Aylesford, Kent." This cemetery was of great interest, as presenting a stage in sepulchral practice not hitherto noticed among the ancient Britons, as well as from the new class of native earthenware and imported bronze vessels brought to light. The graves were small pits in the flat earth, arranged in "family circles," and each containing a group of cineraries and accessory vessels. Mr. Evans showed that the form of interment answered to that prevalent in a large part of Gaul at the time of the Roman invasions; and in a previous paper he had already traced certain stirrup-shaped cinerary vases, through intermediate examples in Belgic Gaul and the Rhine district, to the Illyro-Italic or Old Venetian province round the head of the Adriatic. The bronze vessels which he now described included a patella and omphalos of Italo-Greek work, the first authentic instance of the discovery of such imported vessels in a British cemetery, though Mr. Evans showed that the custom of associating Greek and Etruscan bronzes with their sepulchral deposits was very widely spread among the Gallic tribes on both sides of the Alps. Among the bronzes of indigenous Celtic fabric discovered was a very beautiful plated pail, surrounded with a zone of animals and foliated ornaments in repoussé work, presenting the closest resemblance to the decorative work found in the Helvetic station of La Tène in Switzerland. The fabulous animals depicted were, on the other hand, almost identical with those found on the coins of the Remi, from which Mr. Evans drew the conclusion that this stirrup had been manufactured in the Reims district and imported into Britain. Two British gold coins were also discovered in the cemetery of uninscribed types, which occur indiscriminately on either side of the Channel, and therefore to be referred to some Belgic Prince who reigned in part of both Gaul and Britain. No single object of Roman origin was found in the cemetery; and from a general survey of the evidence, Mr. Evans considered that the sepulchral deposits must be ascribed to the century immediately preceding Caesar's invasion, and referred to the same Belgic invaders who seem at about the same date to have introduced the ancient British coinage. On the other hand, the presence of some rude urns in the traditional British style, and of skeleton interments in cists on the outskirts of the cemetery, appear to indicate the partial survival of the earlier inhabitants on this Kentish site. Altogether, the conditions brought to light by these discoveries, and the close connexion that they pre-supposed between Britain and the Belgic parts of Gaul, suggested a comparison with the connexion between England and Normandy which subsisted in the period immediately succeeding the Norman Conquest.

BROWNING SOCIETY.—(Friday, March 28.)

H. MATHEWS, Esq., in the chair.—A paper by Mrs. de Courcy Laffan on the "Beautiful Commonplaces of Browning" was read.—Dr. Berdoe and Dr. Furnivall both objected to the title, and the latter suggested the term "realism" as preferable to "commonplaces."—Dr. Furnivall then mentioned a paper by Mr. Sagar on the numbering of the lines in "The Ring and the Book," to be printed for the society, and informed members that they would receive copies of Mr. William Sharp's Life of Robert Browning written for the "Great Writers" Series.—Dr. Furnivall then read a short paper by Mrs. Alexander Ireland, whom illness prevented from being present, on "Parent-hood in Browning." The chairman proposed a vote of thanks to Mrs. Ireland for her paper, and drew an interesting contrast between the poetry of Victor Hugo and that of Robert Browning in respect of their treatment of the parental relation, on which the former dwells repeatedly, while the instances in Browning's poetry are few. Dr. Berdoe pointed out how powerfully the poem of "Halbert and Hob" exemplifies the doctrine of heredity, vice being almost certain to reappear in the children. In the instance of "Pompilia," Browning sublimes maternal love. It is a common enough experience that in motherhood a woman bursts into new life, and this new life the poet has most perfectly expressed. Dr. Berdoe thought that the society wanted more of such papers as this of Mrs. Ireland. Dr. Furnivall considered it remarkable that Browning should touch so little on this parental relation, especially as he specially valued his own mother's influence, a fact to which Mr. William Sharp has called our attention in his book. Surely it was his own wife who inspired him with that wonderful consciousness of motherhood in Pompilia. As a man he could scarcely have understood the emotion, but sympathy with his wife and the insight it lent him produced the pure and beautiful creation of Pompilia's short motherhood.

FINE ART.

OBITUARY.

JOHN TURTLE WOOD.

WOOD, of Ephesus, has fallen a true martyr of archaeology. His long life was marked by one great object—the discovery of the Temple of Artemis; and he achieved that discovery, though not to his full satisfaction. Strong as he was to work and to endure, one whose indomitable spirit neither delay nor disappointment seemed able to quell, yet his long life was towards its close embittered and at last shortened by his inability to finish as he would his darling purpose.

Born in 1821, John Turtle Wood was educated as an architect; in due course visited Italy and did some work there; but the turning point of his career came through his appointment in 1858 as architect to the Smyrna and Aidin Railway. In 1862 he chanced to visit Ephesus. The problem, Where is the famous Temple of Artemis? at once rose before him, and the fascination of discovery took final hold of his soul. In May 1863 he began the search at his own cost, an act of characteristic daring; and in March 1864 the trustees of the British Museum granted him £100 for the work. This sum was afterwards largely increased; but it was not till the last day of 1869 that the Temple of Artemis was discovered, where nothing but the most patient research could have detected it. After the ground had been cleared the work was abandoned in March 1874. The whole cost was £16,000; the result, a most important collection of the remains of two temples and a rich series of inscriptions, all now in the British Museum. The later temple, the famous wonder of the world, may be truly said to have contributed a new chapter to Greek archaeology, while quite recently Mr. Murray's discovery and restoration of the sculptured column of the earlier temple, with the dedication of "King Croesus," bid fair to rival the impression made by the later sculptured drums. Mr. Wood would have continued his work to the very end, after the manner of Schliemann, and dug up and sifted all the soil within the temple area; but the authorities in England did not feel it right to make any further expenditure. He then resolved to work alone, lectured and collected promises of money; but the anxiety told on his health, and at last he fell, in this month, at a good age, but yet full of zeal for his life's work, and keenly feeling the disappointment that follows the sense of a great achievement left incomplete. The long confidence of the trustees of the Museum, and of Sir Charles Newton, and the absolute devotion of Mrs. Wood, who shared his privations, and when he was incapacitated by an accident continued his work single-handed, form his true testimonial. His Discoveries at Ephesus, so termed in the modest record which he printed, are his best memorial. His friends hold him dear as a man of unconquerable energy, directed by the highest sense of honour.

REGINALD STUART POOLE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. GOODALL'S contributions to the Royal Academy will well display the variety of his talent. They include two landscapes and two portraits. Both the landscapes were painted from the North Terrace at Windsor. One of them represents the view looking towards Eton, with the college itself as inevitably a prominent object in the middle distance. This, of course, will have much interest; but the artistic public will, we venture to think, prefer the second landscape, which represents a mid-day view, in July weather, of the admirable stretch of field, and park, and woodland—Mr. Browning's "wooded, watered country, England's best"—between Old Windsor and the Thames on the one hand, and the distant hills of Henley on the other. In middle distance is seen the spire of Bray Church, while the actual foreground is occupied by the battlements—or battlemented wall—of the North Terrace. Mr. Goodall's portraits include a pleasant and characteristic portrait of Mrs. Goodall, and what is, we believe—strange to say—the first important portrait of Sir Oscar Clayton. The eminent medical practitioner and homme du monde is represented sitting, and leaning, after his wont, somewhat heavily upon his walking-stick; and, while certainly observing all the time with nothing less than his accustomed shrewdness whatever persons may be in his company, he is engaged at the moment, with evident satisfaction, in telling one of the most genial of his stories. The portrait is painted by an artist who has thoroughly understood his model.

MR. CARL HAAG'S single contribution to the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours—of which he is now vice-president—is a work quite out of his usual line, yet not the less remarkable or forcible. Mr. Haag has, indeed, before now painted several portraits, but these have been executed at long intervals, and have seldom, if ever, been seen. The present work is a portrait of Mr. Papworth, the architect, arrayed befittingly in the robes which he wears as master of the great city company to which he belongs. Mr. Haag has painted this very pleasant portrait in full sunlight, in which the modelling of the face is unobscured by shadow, and in which the sables of the robe glow with a splendid orange-brown.

MR. G. P. A. HEALY—the American painter, long domiciled in Paris, whose works appear habitually at the Salon—will probably this year be represented at the Royal Academy by a portrait of the British minister in France. Lord Lytton is only the latest of a whole troop of diplomatists, from Bismarck downwards, who have sat to Mr. Healy for their counterfeit presentments. At the Salon, Mr. Healy will be represented by a portrait of M. Jules Simon, statesman and writer. The artist has also in a forward state, but not yet ready for exhibition, a characteristic portrait of an eminent English ecclesiastic, of great individuality and charm—a most polished churchman—the Roman Catholic Bishop of Salford. And, not confining himself absolutely to portraiture, Mr. Healy has executed a picture of a child, seated at a meal, in full sunlight; and he has likewise produced a picture of a weaver of Venues—a subject directly suggested by a long sojourn last autumn on the coast of Normandy.

THE proprietors of the Magazine of Art have arranged to issue "Royal Academy Pictures" for 1890 in three parts, instead of two as last year. The first part will be ready on the opening day of the Royal Academy, and it is intended to publish the other two parts during the month of May.

THE Dudley Gallery Art Society will open next week an exhibition of water-colours at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly.

MR. FORD MADOX BROWN'S latest work—"John Kay, Inventor of the Fly-Shuttle, saved by his Wife from the Rioters," forming the tenth of his great series of paintings for the Manchester Town Hall—will be on view next week at Messrs. Dowdeswell's, in New Bond Street. A new picture, by Mr. Edwin Long, entitled "The Market Place at Nazareth," will also then be added to the attractions of the Doré Gallery.

FOLLOWING on the dispersal of his mezzotint portraits, the collection of line engravings and etchings formed by Mr. John Chalonier Smith will be sold by Messrs. Sotheby. The sale begins on Monday next, and will last altogether for fourteen days. The collection is remarkable for its quantity—it numbers 2838 lots—rather than for the rarity or fine state of the prints. The French school is very well represented.

MR. HENRY BLACKBURN will deliver a series of three lectures—on "The Art of Illustration," "Modern Pictures," and "Sketching in Sunshine"—at the Kensington Town Hall, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of next week, and will repeat the series the following week at the Eyre Arms Assembly Rooms, St. John's Wood. The lectures will be illustrated by more than one hundred reproductions of drawings, pictures, and photographs taken in Algeria and Morocco, shown by the oxy-hydrogen light.

THE third general meeting of the Hellenic Society for the present session will take place at 22 Albemarle-street on Monday next, April 14, at 5 p.m., when Mr. A. S. Murray will read a paper on "The Alcmena Vase formerly at Castle Howard," and Mr. F. Newberry a paper on "Funeral Wreaths discovered in Egypt."

THE STAGE.

STAGE NOTES.

MR. FREDERICK WEDMORE writes to us from Paris:—"Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, as great as ever, and in the passages of most profound feeling intense with a curious quietude, continues to represent Joan of Arc with undisputed success. No such unquestioned triumph awaited her when, on Good Friday, she appeared—not, of course, on quite her habitual stage—as the Virgin Mary. Even the genius of the artist, apparent though it was here and there, could not suffice to give impressiveness to a subject of which, even upon the hills of Ober Ammergau, the treatment has become somewhat conventional. There were many interruptions, amid much admiration; but the undaunted tragedian looks forward to repeating her experiment, and, perhaps, under better conditions. There is little new at the theatres—a strange dearth has overtaken the French stage; and, as our novel-writers have supplied material for the Parisian feuilleton, in which Mr. Marion Crawford is shoulder to shoulder with Guy de Maupassant, so the moment may arrive in which Mr. Grundy, Mr. Jones, and Mr. Sims may be sought for actively on the theatres of the Boulevard. A piece is just now, indeed, in rehearsal at the Français; and, to tell the truth, it is not by either of these authors. Meanwhile, in the Rue Richelieu, the regular repertory is the order of the day, and "Le Demi Monde" succeeds "Hernani." The latest performance of M. Dumas's play was undertaken chiefly to ascertain how Mdlle. Marsy—who has beauty and diction and an excellent voice—would cope with the character of Suzanne d'Ange. The lady is attractive, and the performance promising. At the Palais Royal, a new revue—a "topical" piece, the like of which we have scarcely seen in England—shares the bill with the revival of "Le Roi Candaule"; and the one act comedy of Meilhac and Halévy and the new piece, "Les Miettes de l'Année," are both worth seeing. It would hardly be possible to play either better. Messieurs Daubray, Milher, and Luguet do much to make complete the cast of the comedy, and there is a delightful ingénue—tout à fait éveillé, piquante as well as gracieuse—a Mdlle. Clem. Her art has probably somewhat narrow limits. The performance of the "Les Miettes" owes almost everything to M. Saint Germain—Coquelin's contemporary, and almost Coquelin's equal—an artist the ease and imperceptibility of whose art is the very last result of labour. A high comedian indeed! So far as the popular success of the piece is concerned, M. St. Germain is, perhaps, best aided by a Mdlle. Larive—hitherto, I believe, unheard of—the violent ragoût of whose dance it has pleased M. Jules Lemaître to liken to "le piratage de potasse." She has been the subject of a brief but almost exceptionally brilliant piece of writing by this eminently literary critic. M. Lemaître finds in the little lady "l'âme de la danse, l'âme de toutes les danses, depuis les temps anciens jusqu'à nos jours, depuis Salomé jusqu'à la Goyve." Here he overrates her—but says the thing neatly, and so may be forgiven. He is true as well as neat when he adds, "Et avec cela elle reste Montmartroise de Montmartre, par l'aisance, la malice, un rien de blague et de parodie"—for, in fact, Larive's performance is rich in agility and only deficient in grace.

In America, Mr. Wilson Barrett has been—as we have had occasion to notice—the recipient of the most varied attentions from the newspaper press. Silly little people, in silly little papers, have reported—as is the habit of the interviewer—how he looks "when he leans his arms upon the table in a conversational attitude"—an attitude, we must be allowed to say, which this description by no means makes plain to us. Analytical critics have seriously discussed his performances. And again the newspaper writer of lesser mark has made himself the channel for conveying Mr. Barrett's opinions on many matters connected with the stage. Thus at Philadelphia—where, as at St. Louis just before, the actor's success has been undoubted—Mr. Barrett confessed that the first night of "Olito" was the most remarkable first night in his experience. He had to make three speeches to the audience before the people would leave the theatre. Yet "Olito," it will be remembered—dramatic though it was, and literary into the bargain—had not half the lasting success of "The Silver King" and of "Lights o' London," which would seem to be evidence in favour of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's recent contention that the decision of a first night audience is far from being final or irrevocable. By implication, Mr. Barrett allowed that one of his very costliest productions—the late Lord Lytton's "Junius"—had been a commercial failure. He promised us the production, at his new Olympic, very soon after his return, of the drama founded on the most recent of the romances of Mr. Hall Caine. This is good news. Mr. Barrett was very outspoken—he was as straight as it is possible to be—about the condition of the American stage.

Not that he had anything really hard to say against it; but he noted that American plays "run largely to character sketches." Hence many "character-actors."

"You possess," he said, "few heroic actors in proportion to your great army of players; and when an American manager is 'casting' a play, if he has a part demanding a poetic interpretation, he probably seeks an English actor to fill it."

MUSIO.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA SEASON AT DRURY LANE.

THE late founder of the Carl Rosa company attached great importance to the performances in London, and in this he showed his wisdom. Here it is judged by the highest possible standard; adverse criticism cannot fail to profit, while tokens of approval must be highly encouraging. But it is not only to the company that these visits are of advantage; the public is also a gainer.

Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" was the opera chosen for the opening night, Saturday, April 5, and it was given in English for the first time. The composer, it is true, set his music to French words; but the libretto by the late H. B. Farnie is acceptable, in that it contains many lines penned by Shakspeare himself. Mdlle. Zélie de Lussan took the part of the heroine, and achieved a legitimate success; nervousness may explain a few unsatisfactory features both in her singing and acting. Mr. Barton McGuckin appeared as Romeo. He was not in his best voice; but he deserves great praise for his unexaggerated, and therefore effective, dramatic efforts. The artists who undertook the minor rôles are entitled to fair commendation. The chorus was excellent; and the orchestra, under the able direction of Mr. E. Goossens, played admirably. The conductor has his forces well under control, and the subdued manner in which the accompaniments to the songs were given contrasted favourably with what one sometimes hears at the opera. The artists, too, on the stage, by long experience, are thoroughly accustomed to Mr. Goossens' beat, and his bâton is felt rather than seen. The perfect unanimity of the actors, even down to the smaller parts, is striking. In Germany, where year after year the members of a company study and work together, one is accustomed to find each individual acting as part of a whole; here it is more rare. The ensemble of the Carl Rosa troupe is, indeed, one of its strongest points.

The performance of the "Bohemian Girl" on the following Monday afternoon attracted a large audience, and the numerous encores proved that the flowing melodious strains of Balfe have still power to charm a certain section of the public. Mdlle. Tremelli was the Queen; Mr. J. Ould, Thaddeus; Mr. F. H. Celli, Count Arnheim; while Mr. Aynaley Cook appeared in his old character of Devilshoof.

"Carmen" was given in the evening. Mdlle. de Lussan, as the heartless heroine, appeared to greater advantage than on the previous Saturday. She thoroughly looked the part, and sang remarkably well. She managed to portray the changing moods of the wayward gipsy with full intensity, and yet with wonderful ease and naturalness. Mr. Barton McGuckin was at his best as the Jose. He sang in a thoroughly artistic manner; but it was his refined and forcible acting that made most impression. Miss Fabris, the Michaela, came in for her share of success. We were glad to see how reluctantly she acknowledged the applause at the opening of the third act. With the leading characters in such able hands the opera was bound to succeed. But the other artists, in parts familiar to them, obtained the approval of the audience. Mr. Goossens conducted with care and intelligence. The chorus again distinguished itself.

"Faust" was played on Tuesday evening. Mme. Georgina Burns may not be an ideal Marguerite, but her conception of the part is simple and refined, and she sings with artistic skill and taste. Miss Lucille Saunders, who has a voice of pleasing quality, was much applauded for her song in the third act. Signor Runcio, as Faust, sang with more energy than sweetness. The rôle of Mephistopheles does not suit Signor Abramoff.

The mounting of the operas, under the management of Mr. Augustus Harris, is, as usual, praiseworthy.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE concert last Saturday at the Crystal Palace was one of considerable interest; but, being holiday time, there was only a small audience. Mr. Frederic Lamond appeared both as pianist and composer. Two or three seasons ago he gave a recital at Prince's Hall, displaying extraordinary power as an executant. Since then he has been studying abroad, and he now returns an accomplished artist. In Saint Saëns' showy Concerto in C minor (no. 4) he displayed rare talent. His tone is even and pleasant, and he can produce loud effects without hardness. He was much applauded. His own Symphony in A (MS.) is a work of great promise. The writing shows natural ability and culture. The occasional reminiscences of various great composers are not faults in one so young, for Mr. Lamond has only recently attained his majority. Of the four movements, we prefer the first two—an Allegro moderato and an Allegro vivace with Trio. The Symphony—which occupies half-an-hour in performance—was admirably rendered under Mr. Mann's direction, and the composer was summoned to the platform at the close. The programme included Spohr's effective "Jessonda" Overture, and a selection from Schubert's delightful "Rosamunde" music. Miss Margaret Davies and Miss Grace Damian were the vocalists.

An impressive performance of the "Messiah" was given at the Albert Hall on the evening of Good Friday under the direction of Mr. Barnby. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Mme. Belle Cole, and Messrs. Iver McKay and Watkin Mills, who all acquitted themselves well. There was a large audience.

MR. HENRY J. WOOD, a pupil of Mr. Ebenezer Prout at the Royal Academy, has just completed a comedy opera in two acts entitled "Daisy," the libretto by Mr. F. Grove Palmer, which will be performed for the first time on Thursday, May 1, at the Kilburn Town Hall.

From "THE ATHENÆUM."

"The 'Century Dictionary' bids fair to be far and away the largest and best general and encyclopædic dictionary of the English language.....Though cheapness has not been aimed at, the intrinsic merits of the work make it one of the cheapest publications ever issued.....It is calculated that the 'Century' when complete, in the latter part of next year, will comprise about 30,000 more articles than the complete work which now claims pre-eminence in this respect. The first volume, which is now under review, has been evidently edited with all the care and skill to be expected from the supervision of one of the most distinguished philologists in the world.....The work, notwithstanding incalculable variety and difficulty, is singularly free from error of any kind.....To judge from the volume before us, this great work will be characterised throughout, and in every respect, by a lavish expenditure of labour and capital, of rare ability and technical skill, all turned to the best advantage by careful and capable attention to the uniform realisation of a thoroughly judicious plan."

THE LIFE and WRITINGS of ALEXANDER VINET.

By LAURA M. LANE.

With an Introduction by the Venerable Archbishop FARRAR, D.D. "I may say without hesitation that readers will here find a deeply interesting account of a sincere and brilliant thinker.... The publication of this book will be a pure gain if it calls the attention of fresh students to the writings of a theologian so independent as Vinet was, yet so supreme in his allegiance to the majesty of truth."—Archbishop FARRAR.

FOOTE, Dr. CROSSEY, STANTON COIT, C. VOYSEY, and sixteen other leading Specialists on the Forty principal Ethnic Religions, Christian Sects, and Philosophic Creeds.

"A remarkable contribution to the literature of religious thought."—Manchester Guardian.

"A remarkable compendium on religions."—Liverpool Post.

HISTORY of the CIVILIZATION of the RENAISSANCE.

By JACOB BURCKHARDT. Translated and Edited by S. G. C. MIDDLEMORE. A New Edition. In 1 vol., demy 8vo, 15s.

By HUBERT HALL, F.S.A., of H.M. Public Record Office.—With Illuminated Plates, Tint Plates, and 80 Oute.

(1.) COURT LIFE UNDER the PLANTAGENETS. By

HUBERT HALL, F.S.A., of H.M. Public Record Office. Large 8vo, 15s. "Really a delightful book. It contains the results of a close study of the administrative, judicial, and social institutions of England at a most critical period. Pleasantly written and handsomely illustrated."—Journal of Education. "A surprisingly successful reproduction of life in the reign of Henry of Anjou. Of striking interest and genuine value."—Sootman. "Mr. Hall has a keen eye for the human interest in history."—Saturday Review.

Also, by the SAME AUTHOR, large 8vo, 10s. 6d., THIRD EDITION of

(2.) SOCIETY in the ELIZABETHAN AGE. With numerous Coloured and other Plates from Contemporary Drawings, and a large folding Coloured Map of London in the Sixteenth Century. "Students of Elizabethan literature may well rejoice in the recent addition to their libraries of Mr. Hubert Hall's highly interesting and most useful work."—Professor W. HALL, in the Academy. "People who wish to understand the manners and customs of our ancestors of the sixteenth century as they really were, and not as they ought to have been, cannot do better than read it."—Truth.

THOS. DE QUINCEY: UNCOLLECTED WRITINGS.

With Preface and Annotations by JAMES HOGG. 2 vols., each of 350 pages, with Portraits, 12s. "As a master of style alone he is entitled to rank among the 'Immortals.' It is true that nearly all the products of his pen appeared originally in the pages of serials; but there were giants among magazine contributors in those days, and De Quincey was one of them."—Fall Mail. "Two most welcome volumes."—Perks Post. "Mr. Hogg has placed all lovers of De Quincey under an obligation."—Academy.

SCHOPENHAUER'S WORKS.

Translated by T. BAILEY SAUNDERS, M.A.—2s. 6d. each.

(1.) RELIGION: a Dialogue, and other Essays. (From the "Parerga und Paralipomena.")

(2.) THE WISDOM of LIFE ("Aphorismen zur Lebensweisheit," Part I.).

(3.) COUNSELS and MAXIMS ("Aphorismen," Part II.).

Reviewing (1) the Sootman says it is "a vigorous translation of Schopenhauer's minor, but at the same time most popular, writings.....Excellent and suggestive reading." The Literary World says: "In this modest volume we have a selection of very readable essays by the famous pessimistic philosopher, clothed in good intelligible English."

HISTORY of PHILOSOPHY. By Dr. J. E. ERDMANN.

Translated by several English and American Scholars, and Edited by Prof. W. S. HOUGH. I.—ANCIENT and MEDIEVAL, 15s. II.—MODERN, 15s. III.—SINCE HEGEL, 15s.

"A splendid monument of patient labour, critical acumen, and admirable methodical treatment. It is scarcely too much to predict that for the library of the student, for the academic student whose business it is to be primed in the wisdom of ages, and for the literary dilettante, who is nothing if not well up in things that everybody ought to know, these volumes will at once become a necessity for purposes at least of reference—if not of actual study."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Second Edition, 4s. 6d.; 50 copies on Japanese paper, 7s. 6d.

THROUGH the WORDSWORTH COUNTRY. By Prof.

WILLIAM KNIGHT. With 56 Original Illustrations of Lake Scenery by HARRY GOODWIN.

"The illustrations are charming, and admirably characteristic of the scenery."—Times.

"This handsome and seductive volume.....Nothing could be better than Prof. Knight's commentary."—Saturday Review.

BROWNING'S MESSAGE to his TIMES: his Religion, Philosophy, and Science. By EDWARD BERDOE. New Portrait, and 3 Facsimile Letters.

"Much that is helpful and suggestive."—Sootman.

"We have no doubt that the book will meet with the approbation and success which it deserves."—Glasgow Herald.

FOR SO LITTLE: the Story of a Crime. By HELEN DAVIS. 6s.

MORGANTE the LESSER: his Notorious Life and Wonderful Deeds. By SIRIUS.

"There is something of the humour of Defoe and Swift about this curious book."—Vanity Fair.

"A most excellent piece of fooling."—Liverpool Post.

"Many flashes of genuine wit, many sharp touches of satire, and much whimsical power and fancy."—Vanity Fair.

ROBERT OWEN: his Life, Times, and Labours. By

LLOYD JONES. With Portraits, &c., 6s.

"Robert Owen deserves the eulogium of Mr. Lloyd Jones's concluding sentence: 'He laboured for the people, he died working for them, and his last thought was for their welfare.'"—Speaker.

"A worthy record of a life of noble activities."—Manchester Examiner.

Idylls of the Field.

By F. A. KNIGHT, Author of "By Leafy Ways."

"The Author's genuine love of Nature, both animate and inanimate, his rare gift of observation and not less power of description, need no commendation. The admirable little drawings are thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of the book."—Daily News.

Tastefully printed, in crown 8vo, bound in cloth, gilt edges, illustrated, price 5s.

COMPANION VOLUME to "NATURE'S FAIRY-LAND."

Haunts of Nature.

By H. W. S. WORSELEY-BENISON, Fellow of the Linnean Society, Lecturer on Botany at Westminster Hospital Medical School. With numerous beautiful Illustrations by Chas. Worsley.

"We are not surprised that the author of these pleasant and accurate descriptions of birds, flowers, and nature in her changeful moods should have been compared to Richard Jefferies, or that a man like Professor Dallinger should have seen in his work much of the spirit of the late Charles Kingsley."—Leeds Mercury.

Now ready, in crown 8vo, tastefully printed and bound with dainty head pieces, price 5s., post free.

Glimpses of Animal Life.

A NATURALIST'S OBSERVATIONS OF THE HABITS AND INTELLIGENCE OF ANIMALS.

By WILLIAM JONES, F.S.A., Author of "Treasures of the Earth," &c.

"A very pretty book, which all who take an interest in natural history will read with increasing satisfaction. The opening chapter abounds with anecdotes, and all of them afford materials for many instructive lessons; throughout the author seeks to show the bright side of his subject."—London Daily Chronicle.

Now ready, in crown 8vo, tastefully printed, and with numerous Illustrations, bound in cloth, gilt lettered, price 4s. 6d., post free.

A NEW VOLUME OF ADDRESSES AND TALKS TO CHILDREN.

The God of the Children;

OR, HOW THE VOICES OF NATURE SPEAK TO US.

By BEDFORD POLLARD.

"Full of matter which will form texts for pleasant talks, and the author succeeds in keeping the attention of his little auditors by constantly appealing to illustrations within their own experience. Apart from the deeper purpose running through the book—that of showing the Divine wisdom and foresight in Nature—the Natural History information, so pleasantly given, will excite interest and make the book a popular companion of boys at all hours."—FREDERICK ANDREWS, B.A., Head Master of Ackworth Schools.

London: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER-ROW, E.C.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

"For real raciness of style and an inexhaustible fund of anecdotes about Court life, we might look long in vain for a rival to the two volumes just published of "LETTERS of MADAME DU NOYER," translated from the French and edited by Florence L. Layard. In the volumes before us we have her letters to a female correspondent, whose name is unknown, and the latter's replies. The number of anecdotes these two ladies manage to string together in their correspondence is surprising; they simply laid themselves out to amuse each other, and their letters accordingly teem with stories of Court scandals, intrigues, witty sayings, practical jokes, and ludicrous mistakes, which are none the less amusing for belonging to a long-past era."

Daily Telegraph.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MY LITTLE LADY."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE PARISH OF HILBY."

ONE ANOTHER'S BURDENS.

By MARY E. MANN,
Author of "A Lost Estate," &c.
In 3 vols., crown 8vo.

"Miss Mann's village stories are refreshingly clever. In 'One Another's Burdens' she has brought together the necessary materials for an excellent one, and has employed them with undaunted ability."—Morning Post.
"Miss Mann has plenty of humour, as is shown by her amusing description of Miriam's unsuccessful novel, its critiques and its fate; and plenty of power and capacity of telling a story."—Saturday Review.
"A pretty and carefully written story."—Athenaeum.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "UNDER A CHARM."

A HEAVY RECKONING.

By E. WERNER,
Author of "No Surrender," &c.
In 3 vols., crown 8vo.

"An able and vigorous work, written with force and power of imagination, and a good command of language. The characters are drawn with a firm hand and possess a marked individuality."—Athenaeum.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "AN UGLY DUCKLING." BY WOMAN'S FAVOUR.

By HENRY ERROLL,
Author of "The Academician," &c.
In 3 vols., crown 8vo.

"Mr. Erroll's realism is forcible without being coarse. His new work should assign him a good place among the realistic novelists of the day."—Morning Post.
"The cleverest book that Henry Erroll has produced—regarded, indeed, from the standpoint of plot construction, it is almost faultlessly clever. In all respects a sound piece of literary workmanship, and a good and enjoyable book."—Academy.

By the Author of "THE PHANTOM FUTURE."

SUSPENSE.

By H. S. MERRIMAN,
Author of "Young Mistley," &c.
In 3 vols., crown 8vo.

"There is some strong and delicate character drawing in Mr. Merriman's last book. The plot is quite subservient to the portraiture of the three principal characters. . . . We have some very tender and vivid descriptions of northern scenery in midsummer."—Daily News.

The Permanent Elements of Religion. Bampton Lectures for 1887. By W. Boyd-Carpenter, D.D., Bishop of Ripon. (Macmillan.)

FOR several reasons the Bampton Lectures of 1887 are very remarkable. In the first place, the choice of the subject denotes a shrewder insight into the special religious needs of the time than seems to pertain to the average Bampton Lecturer. A discussion of "the Permanent Elements of Religion" at a time when sciolists of various kinds are attacking the permanence of Christianity from without, and sacerdotalists are industriously confusing its permanent with its transitory elements from within, cannot be called needless or inopportune. With comparatively few exceptions, the rulers of the Church of England cannot be credited with profound penetration into those questions and problems which are most pressing for solution in the religious world, nor with engrossing solicitude as to the manner in which they may best be met. They hear the rumblings of the earthquake, and are conscious of an occasional shock, without manifesting much anxiety to test the foundations of the edifice of which they are the appointed guardians. That all religions are transitory, that Christianity is an effete and outworn creed, are doctrines which they know are being preached with greater clamour and insistence every day. They see men of culture, probably disdaining the attempt to force on them the transitory in place of the permanent elements of religion, leaving the Church in increasing numbers; and yet they show no sign of appreciating the situation, still less of any bona fide attempt to grapple with its peril. All honour then to the Bishop of Ripon for manfully selecting as the theme of his Bampton Lectures a question so closely in touch with the most cogent needs and thoughts of the time.

But if the bishop's choice of his subject is both happy and significant, the same qualities may be said, on the whole, to mark its treatment. It is, as every such discussion should be, liberally broad, catholic, and sympathetic. He does not take his stand on certain axiomatic dogmas or features of Christianity, and erect them into an infallible standard by which all other religious faiths should be estimated. That has been the favourite method with Christian evidence writers from time immemorial. Even when the elements of Christianity were placed on a footing of theoretical equality with those of other faiths, it was merely with the object of traducing the latter by the supposed contrast. The Bishop of Ripon, on the contrary, takes his stand on the broad and philosophical foundation of comparative religion. For the purposes of his argument, Christianity is one of the Universal Religions. He ranks it side by side with Islam and Buddhism. Doubtless he arrives at the conviction of its superiority, but it is by the path of inductive and a posteriori ratiocination. It is not arbitrarily and arrogantly assumed from a high a priori standpoint. The supremacy is of degree rather than of kind. Christianity shares the permanent elements common more or less to all religions, but it possesses them in greater abundance. That is the cause, as it is also the measure, of its superiority.

The central interest of the bishop's lectures turns therefore on those attributes or features of religion which he regards as permanent, discovering them in the past and present and auguring them in the future. These "permanent elements" he declares to be Dependence, Fellowship, and Progress, which, if we interpret Hope as an aspiration of growth, do not differ essentially from the Pauline triad—Faith, Hope, and Charity. Now, the permanence of these elements depends, according to the lecturer, on the laws by which man's spiritual nature grows. Of these he mentions four (he does not pretend that his enumeration is exhaustive), viz. (1) The law of environment; (2) The law of organism; (3) The law of sacrifice; (4) The law of indirectness. The outcome of these laws he gives as follows:—

"As we think, we are. As we are, we see. Progress is through Sacrifice. Sacrifice to be sure must be inspired by something higher than the desire to be self-sacrificing" (p. 41).

Not improbably this is the feature of the bishop's lecture, which will be most severely attacked. Indeed, it is obvious that the divisions are not logical. Whether regarded in their origin or in their scope, the laws are wholly defective in homogeneity. They do not stand on the same plane of thought, are not regulated by similar conditions, do not operate in the same manner, and cannot claim to be universal in the same sense. The first two are in reality one—i.e., the indissoluble connexion which exists between a man's religion and his physical and mental environment. This, on analysis, proves to be only another form of Montaigne's oft-quoted remark about religion being a geographical expression, which Pascal characteristically emphasises in his Pensées (Art. iii. § 8). The third law, that of sacrifice, emerges in a wholly different sphere, and is dependent on subjective conditions of another kind. For, although it has certain analogies in the natural world, and is found in most religions of a higher type, its real sanctions cannot claim to be of the same universal kind as the laws of environment. Similarly, the law of indirectness is also a recognised fact of man's spiritual nature, but its scope and recognition are hardly sufficiently universalised to establish a claim to be considered a general principle. The need of unselfconsciousness in religion which the law asserts is a profound truth which one would gladly see more insisted on; but, bearing in mind the relation it must inevitably assume to certain other religious truths or doctrines accepted as such, it seems a little premature to describe it in terms of a universally ruling principle. Without penetrating further into this part of my subject, it is clear that the bishop's four laws require recasting if they are to attain the merit, to which they are evidently meant to aspire, of philosophical coherence. Indeed, this preliminary part of the discussion seems to me superfluous. The permanent elements of religion might more simply and intelligibly have been collected from a survey of universal or largely diffused religions, without insisting on prior conditions which are partly self-evident axioms, and partly are comprehended under the permanent elements themselves, since both sacrifice and unselfconsciousness must be held to be implied in any true notion of "fellowship" or human love.

Passing to the three elements already mentioned, which Dr. Boyd-Carpenter affirms to be permanent in all religions, they do not seem to need much discussion. No one who has penetrated to the root-thought of most religions can fail to recognise that dependence on some greater power is the principle which best explains their primary stages, both as to thought and rite. Nor is it merely an initial principle. It may easily be expanded, as it was by Schleiermacher, so as to comprehend the loftiest aspirations and acts of religious culture and worship. The bishop traces this element as an original or adventitious principle in most ancient religions, and has no difficulty in demonstrating its importance in Christianity. Similarly, fellowship is a primary human instinct whose instrumentality in originating and sustaining religion is unquestioned. Of the two, and as implying a greater share of the directly human element, it may be said to have a higher importance than dependence. Its value as a central principle of Christianity is a self-evident truth. That neither dependence nor fellowship, regarded as elements of religion, should be pushed to the extreme of annihilating personality, is a truth which the bishop incidentally admits, though he does not, I think, perceive the likelihood, in the advance of religious as of political culture, that the individual will resist more and more his passive absorption by the community. This, however, merely means that the limits and conditions of membership of any future church must be more elastic than, as a rule, they have been in past or existing churches—a conclusion, indeed, which on various grounds is forcing itself with continually growing intensity on the convictions both of religious and political leaders. At any rate, both dependence and fellowship are elements of religion as to whose importance and permanence there can be no question. The novelty of the bishop's triad consists in his including as its third element that of progress. By this, however, the bishop does not mean the advance in dogmatic intensity and expansion, which seems the only idea of it that certain ecclesiastics are capable of forming. It is not the growth which culminates in such dogmas as the Infallibility of the Pope or the Immaculate Conception, or which pushes sacramental efficacy to the self-stultifying extreme of materialism. From the doctrine of development as laid down by Cardinal Newman, the Bishop of Ripon's definition of progress differs as much as the morbid development caused and maintained by disease differs from the free growth of a healthy organism. He defines its nature and operation in terms which deserve quotation :

"To these two features I venture to add a third—Progress. This expresses belief in the forward and upward movement of creation, the belief in personal spiritual progress, and the conviction that not for ourselves alone do the wheels of time move forward, but that they bear all things onward to an age in which the children of men shall be blessed. . . . If stagnation is misery, progress is happiness, and it can hardly be ignored in a religion which aspires to be abiding. . . . Religion cannot be one with men unless it be one with men's growth and progress" (p. 55).

"There is a third element," he says in another place (p. 102), "for which we must look—Progress—the spirit which links itself with the welfare of the race. Dependence and Fellowship are not enough; the spirit of man desires to bind itself for good with the growing life of the world."

The preceding sketch of the bishop's lectures will I think serve to convey a clear impression of their method, and will throw incidental light on their tone and spirit. They may be described as a well considered and determined attempt to solve some of the religious questions which at present seem pressing most eagerly for solution. The attempt is made in a spirit of kindly consideration and large-hearted Christian charity not too common among English divines. Of his sympathetic treatment of the founders of other religions than that of Christ's we have a striking example in his description of Mohammed. The quotation may also serve as an illustration of the bishop's eloquence and graphic power :

"We can understand him better as we recall his traditional portraiture. A little and slender figure, broad shouldered and upbearing proudly his majestic head, crowned with dark flowing and curling hair; an oval face bronzed by the sun; the nose, 'the rudder of the face and index of the will,' strong and masterful; teeth brilliant as hailstones and eyes bright as stars; soft small nervous hands—all made up a figure goodly to look upon. His peculiarities also are known to us—the deep bloodvessel on the forehead that darkened with passion; the strange egg-mark between the shoulders, the so-called seal of prophecy; and the gracious gait, light and springing, as of one stepping downwards. Joyous he was and loving as a child, patient as a woman; ready now to romp with the children, to tell them stories, now to sit patiently in a foul dense atmosphere, nursing the sick child till it died with its head on his bosom; full of a sweet soft courtesy which would not willingly offend by gesture or by manner; never the first to withdraw his hand from another's grasp, or to turn aside from another's converse. Altogether, you would say, a delicate organisation, sensitive, passionate, responsive; drawn to a strange sad love of solitude, yet longing for the solace and soothing of a woman's hand, and flying to her sheltering arms as to a safe place from the wild terrors which at times fell upon him. Briefly, he is a man with that mixture of qualities which Coleridge declared needful for the highest genius—that blending of masculine and feminine qualities which is called androgynous" (pp. 80, 81).

The description is too long to quote at length, and I must be content with referring my readers to it as a striking exemplification of the genial kindness with which our best Christian advocates are now accustomed to treat the founders of alien faiths. In close relation with the bishop's sympathetic dealing with other creeds is his pronounced deprecation of extreme dogmatism in his own. The following quotation gathers into a focus of concentrated eloquence the spirit which pervades all the Lectures. No recent utterances could be mentioned more replete with painful reminiscences as to the past, or fuller of brighter hope for the future. I can only regret my inability to transcribe more than a part of a passage as full of truth in its matter as of fire and brilliancy in its form :

"As religions cannot do without this personal being, so his presence elevates, enlivens, and widens religious thought and worship. The creed, as we have said, becomes ethicised. There is need of this. There has been enough philosophising of creeds; they have been treated as though they were a series of propositions demanding the assent of the mind, and to which the assent of the mind was sufficient. The eager and shallow dogmatist who worshipped not God, but clung vehemently and immorally to his creed, demanded intellectual assent. Headless of the need of intellectual honesty or of the ethical significance of the creed, he saw no alternative between the declaration of assent to a theological proposition and the eternal damnation of a human soul. He made it possible for men to say, and to say it with a measure of truth, that orthodoxy was the sin against the Holy Ghost. His creed became a fetish; instead of Believe in God, believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, he held aloft his creed and cried Believe It" (p. 276).

The bishop's augury of the religion of the future is quite in harmony with this enlightened estimate of mere formulas of belief. He asks :

"On what will the religion of the future be based? Will it be founded on new intellectual conceptions? . . . Will it be founded on a creed, or a code, or a person?"

He continues :

"Our answer, I think, must be not on a creed nor on a code, but on a person. Not on a creed unless we desire to have a cold religionism instead of a living moving religion. Not on a code unless we are prepared to hand over the race-progress to the cold ministry of a bloodless moralism. But on a person, for in a person alone is the conception of religion real and the thought of morality a living thing."

It is from the standpoint and with the spirit indicated in the foregoing passages that Dr. Boyd-Carpenter determines other questions and issues pertaining to his subject. This, e.g., is how he decides the relation of belief to conduct :

"Orthodoxy, it is said, is preferred to morality. True, the religionist prefers it. Orthodoxy and ceremonial are put by him above the religion of life. But Christianity, the Christianity of Christ, reverses the order. 'I was an hungred,' said Christ, 'and ye gave me meat; thirsty and ye gave me drink'" (p. 194).

I have no space to adduce further extracts or to dwell at greater length on the many remaining points of interest which the Bishop of Ripon's Bampton Lectures offer for consideration. What I have said will, I hope, suffice for my immediate purpose, which is to call my readers' special attention to what might almost be characterised as a new departure in the method and treatment of the Lecture. Dr. Boyd Carpenter is not content to remain in the serene aloofness of an academic professor or some erudite Dryasdust propounding or defending schemes of traditional belief with little or no reference to the actual needs of the time. He buckles on his shield, girds him with his sword, and himself descends into the arena where the conflict is in arduous progress. Doubtless his idiosyncrasy and training have given him special qualifications for the work. Thus he is more of a rhetorician and popular pulpit orator than he is a severe logician. The minor defects of his Lectures seem attributable to that undeniable fact. His systematic presentation of the scheme of his Lectures, though not suffering from any fatal defect, lacks the compactness and homogeneity which characterise the severe consecutive thinker. His style also, though always clear and forcible and oftentimes marked by burning and irresistible eloquence, sometimes descends into the lower regions of pulpit sensationalism. A similar note of his popular sympathies may be found in his stress on novels as illustrative of the positions in his Lectures. Probably this is the feature of the Bampton Lectures of 1887 which would most strike the reader accustomed to the tone and style of these productions with a feeling of strangeness. Ordinarily, when the Bampton lecturer is a scholar, the learning necessarily restrained in the sermons overflows in the notes which, as a rule, bristle with names of and quotations from classical, patristic, and philosophical authorities. Here, however, where we might have expected to see Augustine and Jerome, Aquinas and Ockam, Kant, Fichte, and Hegel jostle each other, we find quotations from George Sand and George Eliot, Dickens's Oliver Twist, George Gissing's Thyrza, Mr. Baring Gould's John Herring, and White Melville's Bones and I. I am very far from saying that this novelty, however grotesque it may seem at first sight, is not justifiable—nay, it seems to me, from the bishop's standpoint, wholly inevitable. It is surely time, as he himself remarks, that the attention of popular theologians should be directed, not so much to the schemes of philosophers and schoolmen of a bygone day, as to the thoughts and controversies among which our own lot is cast.

But, whatever abatement some may award to the bishop's lectures for thus sinking to the level of the popular preacher seems to me far more than compensated by the two undeniable facts—that he clearly recognises the pressing religious needs of the time, and has endeavoured to meet them in the enlightened and liberal manner by which in my opinion they can alone be met. Not a little will have been achieved by his work if it should induce thoughtful men to consider the question of the elements of religion, to discriminate those which are evanescent from those that are inherent and enduring; and to rest calmly on the conviction that, whatever else is perishable in human thought and life, the primordial elements of religion, those that are gathered from history and vouched by human experience, are indubitably permanent.

JOHN OWEN.

"RULERS OF INDIA."—The Marquess of Dalhousie. By Sir W. W. Hunter. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

SIR WILLIAM HUNTER has added to his labours in Indian literature by undertaking to edit a series of little books now issuing from the Clarendon Press under the title of "Rulers of India."

"The leading idea is to present a series of historical retrospects rather than of personal biographies. Each little book takes some conspicuous epoch in the making of India, and—under the name of its principal personage—sets forth the problems which he had to encounter, the work which he achieved, and the influences which he left behind."

The series opens with the work whose title appears here; and it presents all those qualities which we are wont to expect from the gifted author, not unmixed with those little peculiarities which are their inevitable shadows. The career of "the first Governor-General of India"—for Dalhousie's predecessors had taken the name of their office from Bengal—has been very lately sketched by Capt. Trotter, whose book with the same title as this was reviewed in the ACADEMY of September 7, 1889. It will be sufficient on the present occasion to sum up that career in a few terse sentences extracted from Sir W. Hunter's "Argument":

"Expansion of territory, unification of territory, and the drawing forth of material resources, these were the three labours given to Lord Dalhousie to accomplish in India; and in the three words conquest, consolidation, and development, his work may be summed up."

Adhering to this distribution, the author proceeds to notice, in order, the conquest and consolidation of the Punjab, and of Lower Burma; the annexation of native states; and the chief lines of organisation introduced by the great proconsul in the direction of railways, telegraphs, public works, post office, education, finance, and military policy. All this various and complicated record is disentangled and displayed with admirable skill and clearness; although readers already acquainted with the facts may be disposed to cavil at a certain optimism, a blinking of drawbacks, and a somewhat too deferential propitiation of the general reader. That rather indolent Philistine—the present writer speaks for himself—is astonished to find out how ridiculously perfect his hero was, and how preternaturally intelligent he himself has suddenly become. But after a somewhat deeper and wider examination of the facts, one begins to see that the rude realities of life are neither so simple nor so easily disposed of.

Take, for example, the account of the annexation of the Punjab, of which some account was recently offered in these columns—Sir J. Login and Dulip Singh (ACADEMY, October 26, 1889)—and compare the author's version. The young Raja, we are told, "was amply provided for by a pension of £50,000 a year and the titular dignity of prince." The last five words are absolutely without foundation. The title of "prince" is unknown in English heraldry, and it is needless to add that it was not invented for Dulip (or, as Sir William prefers to spell the name, "Dulip"). As to the alleged "pension," the statement is almost equally misleading. What was created was a yearly allowance of "not less than four and not exceeding five lakhs per annum for the support of himself, his relatives, and the servants of the State." The Raja's own personal share of the annuity was at first £12,000 a year, raised in 1859 to £25,000.

As to public works, railways, &c., it is certainly impossible to overrate the wisdom and soundness of Lord Dalhousie's doings. But on the subject of annexation, Sir W. Hunter can hardly suppose that the last word has been said. Granting the distinction between "independent" and "dependent" states, and admitting that, both at home and in India, others were as much in favour of "the doctrine of lapse" as Dalhousie, the fact remains that the doctrine was dropped after the revolt of 1857. Dalhousie and his supporters honestly believed that the rulers of these "dependent" states were necessarily effete or worse, and that the people preferred British rule. Some of the events of 1857-8 taught a different lesson; and even John Lawrence only ventured still to suggest that the natives were happier under British rule, "did they but know it."

Such, then, are two countercharges that must be weighed in giving a final historical estimate of Dalhousie's administration. His arrangements with Dulip Singh were vague, if not oppressive; and his application of the lapse-doctrine was founded on imperfect knowledge of the case at large. Sir William gives generous emphasis to his foresight in military matters, and shows how the mutiny of the Bengal army derived most of its strength from the neglect of the home government to attend to the governor-general's entreaties for a diminution of the native forces and an augmentation of the European element. But there is some reason to believe that here also Dalhousie was not thoroughly acquainted with the facts, and did not understand the real defects of the Bengal military system.

Nevertheless, after allowance is made for all shortcomings, the author has produced a skilful and most attractive picture. When the brilliant lowland noble was retiring, weary and broken, from the scene of his arduous and protracted labours, a nameless admirer addressed him in a Calcutta paper with some spirited lines, of which the first stanza was as follows:

"Ere Campbells yet were lords of Lorne,
While yet Buccleugh was harrying kine,
Were Ramsays in Dalwalsey born—
And Froissart tells what sires were thine."

And the lines struck the true key-note. It was because James Ramsay came of a pure and masterful race that he was what he was, high-minded, ardent, and fearing no man. "To fear God," he once wrote, "and to have no other fear, is a maxim of religion; but the truth of it, and the wisdom of it, are proved day by day in politics"—a strange voice in the wilderness of official minutes.

It only remains to add that the book is based on careful study of the best available materials. Dalhousie's own papers are sealed for the present; but the author has made good use of public and private documents, and has enjoyed the privilege of being aided by the deceased statesman's family. His little work is, consequently, a valuable contribution to modern history.

Tales and Legends from the Land of the Tsar. Translated from the original Russian by Edith M. S. Hodgetts. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

WE have had no book of Russian folk-tales since the meritorious work of the late Mr. Ralston, published as long ago as 1873. Of this, however, no second edition has appeared. And in some respects the present work by Miss Hodgetts is better adapted to the general reader, especially the younger generation; for it does not contain any notes on comparative folk-lore, such as are calculated to interest only a limited class for whom the commentaries of Mr. Ralston will always retain their value. Stories are most welcome to the ordinary public when given with all their original vivacity, and even tautology and contradictions; and it is in a popular manner that Miss Hodgetts has presented her selection to us.

And what tales they are! Full of the wildest flights of fancy, as she truly remarks in her preface. In fact, the audacity of these folk-tales is the quality which will first strike the person who reads them. They teem with adventures, all is direct action; and they do not contain any of the sententious moralising which we find in the Hitopadesa, or the "Book of Wisdom and Falsehood" of the Georgian Sulkhan Orbelian. You are left to draw your own inferences. In these tales all probabilities and possibilities are cast to the winds. A notable characteristic which they possess is the glorification of physical force, with a considerable admixture of cunning, as in "Reynard the Fox." The Russian does not seem to care for philosophising; he is too naïve for that, and it is just this absence of all attempts at "improving the occasion" which will make these stories popular among our young friends. Children do not care for moral tags.

Some of the tales have been previously translated into English, in Mr. Ralston's book, for instance; but with that notable exception Russian folk-stories have been rather neglected in Western literature. Chodzko, in his Contes des Paysans et des peuples Slaves (1864), almost ignores them; and as he affects to adopt the opinions of Duchinski about the great Russian race, he looks for the sources of his tales in any other direction.

At least two of the pieces given by Miss Hodgetts are Russian bilini, or legendary ballads—"The Last of the Russian Warriors" and the celebrated chant of Ilya Muromets, whose name is somewhat disguised in the form which it assumes in her book. This bilina is interesting, as giving us a glimpse how Vladimir, the first Christian sovereign, presented himself to the popular imagination in Russia. Strange to say, we find next to nothing about him in his religious character, if we except his contest with the idolater. Ilya is the most popular hero of the old Volksepos. Vladimir is holding high court at sacred Kiev:

"Elie (Ilya) galloped straight into the prince's court, jumped off his noble steed and tied him up to an old oak-post. This done, he went to the sacred [svietlomu, bright?] palace of the prince to pray, and after having offered up thanks for his recovery, he made a low bow to the prince and princess."

"Now the great Prince Vladimir was holding a feast; there were princes and grand nobles present, and many a valiant warrior. When Elie Muromitch (Ilya Maromets) had finished praying, a mighty bowl, large as a modern pail, was handed to him, full of green wine. Elie (Ilya) took the bowl, and, raising it to his lips, drank off the contents at one draught.

"Then up rose the great Prince Vladimir and spoke, for he and his people were greatly amazed.

"Tell me thy name, young stranger, tell me thy father's name, that we may know what seat to give thee."

This quaffing the bowl of wine will perhaps remind some of our readers of a passage in the Frithof Saga: "Ej tvenne män det tömde som männer äro nu" (not two strong men in these new days could drain that mighty cup). It will be observed that the wine is green, the favourite conventional epithet in these bilini. In the same way it is always the "damp" earth, the "thick" forest, and so on.

In some of the tales we notice that Miss Hodggetts has adopted a slightly different version from that given by Afanasiev—Prince Kid-skin, for instance; but the variations are most conspicuous in the names, and no greater proof could exist of their being genuine folk-tales than these slight discrepancies. The very quaint story, "Ivashko and the Witch," is identical in its main details with one given in the Essays on Southern Russia (Zapiski o yuzhnoi Rossii) by Kulish. It there appears in a Malo-Russian version under the title "Ivas i Viedma."

But it would be out of place here to discuss the various versions and translations of these curious stories. We can only say that for grown-up and young folk who wish to revel in a world of fancy, and to give free rein to their imaginations, there is abundance of material. Out of the great quantity of these stories—and only those familiar with the works of Afanasiev, Rudebenko, Kulish, Erlenvain, and others, know how many there are—Miss Hodggetts has translated those which are most representative. She gives them in free, racy, half-colloquial English, corresponding to their forms in the original language, where we have the repetition and droll jingles known to all who have studied them. The familiarity of the translator with the Russian language is a sufficient guarantee of their accuracy. But why does she give us the proper names in such odd forms?

W. R. MORFILL.

Merlin and other Poems. By John Veitch. (Blackwood.)

PROF. VEITCH is a Wordsworthian in the same sense as was his countryman, Thomas Aird, whom he recalls in several respects; and his new volume is, even more than his Hillside Rhymes, instinct with that Wordsworthian spirit which inspired his recent prose work on Nature in Scottish Poetry. I have a suspicion, indeed, that Prof. Veitch has allowed—unconsciously, no doubt—Wordsworth to influence him too much, that he has striven to be simple after the Lake fashion, when he ought to have given free rein to Scotch enthusiasm. Take, for example, these lines from "My own Familiar Hills"—a subject which would have almost justified effusiveness:

"In August glows the heather,
And gleams the bracken green;
The milk-wort lifts its gentle face,
The grassy tufts between."

Here it must be allowed that Prof. Veitch is not Wordsworthian, but simply matter-of-fact; and there are many things in this collection which are quite as prosaic as the lines I have quoted.

Prof. Veitch is seen to far greater advantage, and is, indeed, far more of himself in some of his border ballads or traditions, such as "The Laird of Schelynlaw," and "A Legend of Neidpath Castle." The former of these is very nearly perfect in its simplicity. The murder of the "lane auld man in his auld keep" is merely hinted at; and then there is a touch of Stevensonian lightness and suggestiveness in the remorse of the murderer, for whom there is no more sunshine.

"The sun is no' gaun to daw—
For that straik o' blude and that clot o' blude
On the breist o' auld Schelynlaw."

The Merlin who gives Prof. Veitch's book its title is not Merlin Ambrosius, the man of Roman descent who superseded Vortigern in the Cymric supremacy and lost it again in 465; but Merlin Caledonius, otherwise Merlin Wylt or Silvestris. He was the son of Mervyn, who was descended from the head of one of the royal lines of the Cymri; he was also the friend of Prince Gwenddolen, a lord or king of the North, and was present—on the losing side—at that decisive battle in 573, in which the issue was decided between the Pagan and Christian forces of the time. After this defeat, he is said to have fled to the wilds of Drummelzier, and there, after some years of disconsolate brooding over the differences between Christianity and his own creed of Nature-worship, to have been beaten to death by some herdsmen of the district. It is absolutely necessary to give this explanation; otherwise, it will be impossible to understand the motive of Prof. Veitch's poem, which lies in the struggle in Merlin's mind between the two rival creeds, with both of which he has some sympathy. The conflict leaves him destitute of ambition, and in a sense also destitute of power. Prof. Veitch first presents Merlin soliloquising, a lonely man and the embodiment of despair. The conclusion the dreamer comes to is:

"What, then, this life of ours but pain and wreck?

Mirage that hovers fair o'er youthful sky;
Inwoven dream that parts as mist before
The sun of noon; mid-life a battle 'gainst
Fierce striving powers for issues no one knows
Are in their final outcome good or ill,
None seeking whither tends the deed we do
In the mysterious process of the world."

Merlin's twin sister (the Dawn) and his sweetheart (the Gleam) appear, and endeavour to soothe him and touch him to finer and simpler issues. He is not irresponsive; but his complete moral deliverance, his attainment of peace of mind, comes only through death—a death at the hands of rude rustics, who denounce him as "the devil's son," the destroyer of their crops, who spares neither shepherd nor lamb. Prof. Veitch's blank verse flows smoothly, and it undoubtedly gives graceful expression to his leading idea, which is essentially the familiar "all discord, harmony not understood."

The moral bouquet of this little volume—its Scotch piety, purity, and resignation to what is accepted as the Divine will—is superior, however, to any one poem or stanza in it. And this shows how unconscious and complete is Prof. Veitch's Wordsworthianism.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

A Tour in a Phaeton. By James John Hissey. (Bentley.)

READERS will soon begin to expect an annual volume from Mr. Hissey with the regularity of the bellman's Christmas verses. This last summer he takes us with him on his holiday through Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk—counties not usually considered picturesque, and therefore known to few save their inhabitants, but able to yield a rich harvest to the practised eye of the author. The churches of the district, the old manor houses such as Layer Marney, quaint inns once prosperous in the days of coaches but now just kept alive by market day, the Broads, Rushmere Heath, the pleasanter aspects of the scenery, the old-world beliefs of the rustics, form the staple of his researches. He drove the phaeton to Colchester and Ipswich, and thence near the coast by Saxmundham and Yarmouth to Cromer, returning to town by Bury St. Edmunds, Sudbury, and Chelmsford.

The record of this trip, told in four hundred pages, but lightened by a score of pretty sketches, is not wit out interest to the lover of his native land. Mr. Hissey's style is level and withal agreeable, much like the scenery through which he passes. Every here and there it rises to enthusiasm or skilful detail, just as the Langdon Hills or the high lands near Thetford diversify their districts. Still, to do justice to Mr. Hissey's book, a man must be practised in skipping. Over and over again he moralises at some length, and that on very trite subjects. The comparison of English landscape beauty with continental, the advantages of driving through the country instead of speeding through it with the rush of the express train, the delights of old-fashioned rustic inns instead of the pretentious plate glass and high portals of the modern hotel, are often in his mouth. When the reader comes to such pages as these (and there are many of them), let him imitate Mr. Hissey's own procedure in an uninteresting part of a rural district—pass on at once without a moment's delay. Life is hardly long enough to spend much time on green wastes like "the scenery of roadside England is not exciting; there is nothing very wonderful or strange about it; there is no need of strong adjectives to describe it; it is neither grand nor sublime—merely beautiful, but, oh, how great is its dower of beauty! what a revelation of loveliness," &c.; or on arid tracts like

"those past-time inns, the outcome of the picturesque coaching days, when they have not been altered or improved to suit modern requirements, how they delight the eye of the nineteenth-century traveller along the old high roads! Oh, the charm of these quaint and comfortable hostels, when they have been simply maintained, neither restored nor yet allowed to go to decay, wayside pictures they!"

and much more of the same kind. All sensible persons have by this time learnt the pleasures of a ramble through the by-roads of England. There is really no need to blow the horn so loudly as the phaeton passes by.

NEW NOVELS.

The Emancipated. By George Gissing. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

For Somebody's Sake. By Edith S. Drewry. In 3 vols. (White.)

The Nugents of Carriconna. By Tighe Hopkins. In 3 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

Briars; or, on Dangerous Ground. By A. M. Monro. In 2 vols. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

Daniels Cortis. Translated from the Italian of Antonio Fogazzaro. By Stephen Louis Simeon. (Remington.)

A Society Scandal. By Rita. (Trischler.)

Paul Jones's Alias. By D. Christie Murray and Henry Herman. (Chatto & Windus.)

Miss Ludington's Sister. By Edward Bellamy. (Frederick Warne.)

When the author condescends to alight from these altitudes and treat of the common sights of East Anglia which are yet so very uncommon to strangers, we gladly linger with him. Thus, the Roman relics at Colchester or the museum at Bury St. Edmunds are well and simply described. The wonders of Sudbury Church, the Sussex windmills, and round church towers of Norfolk, obtain several pleasant pages. It is interesting to have the striking features of East Dereham Church (where Cowper is buried) quietly pointed out. Without the formality of a guide-book, Mr. Hissey's volume describes the general aspects of the country faithfully and the particular features with praiseworthy care. He devotes his last chapter to hints for those about to take a driving tour, which are full of common sense. Stables, maps, fodder, equipment—nothing is forgotten. With careful treatment he shows that horses can be worked continuously on such a tour at the rate of twenty miles a day, not only without injuring them but positively with benefit to their condition. It is speed, he rightly insists, not distance that tells upon them. A judicious driver will get double the work out of a horse that a careless random one can attain.

Doubtless it is owing to Mr. Hissey's Transatlantic nationality that things strike him as strange which appear simple enough to Englishmen. Thus he had never heard of a "Queen of the Gipsies" when shown Reptonia Lee's monument at Kesgrave. In all probability, therefore, he has never been at Yetholm, where he would find plenty of Lees and a real live queen, or read the ballads of Johnnie Faa, "Lord and Erle of Little Egypt." Again, our forefathers delighted to build their stately homes in valleys rather than on commanding situations as we do, because it was important that they should not catch the eye of enemies. There is no need to comment on an inscription which he found in little Braxted Church, and "which did not seem to me to be good Protestant doctrine," because an Evangelist has saved us the trouble of doing so. But it is somewhat singular to find a well-read American gravely remarking that the political arguments of the rural tap-room orators "are, on the whole, conducted very good-naturedly, and with as much good sense, or more, than is shown in Parliament." It is sad to think how low the British Parliament has sunk.

Whether considered as engravings or as typical representations of East Anglian scenery, Mr. Hissey's illustrations are excellent. Reproduced as they are from his sketches, they help the reader to understand something of the pleasure which this driving tour gave him. His book is sufficiently interesting to tempt us to wish him golden weather, and that delightful vein of contentment with which he usually travels, for next year also. And if he is in want of a new land wherein to make observations, let us suggest a raid into the West, say, into that delightful tract of country which lies between Shrewsbury, Ludlow, and Hereford, and so let him pass onwards to Abergavenny, and thence return by Monmouth, Ross, and the Malvern Hills. In this district he will find old churches, halls, hills, battlefields, and fine prospects to his heart's content.

M. G. WATKINS.

If it were not for a certain undercurrent of pessimism running through his work, Mr. George Gissing would take high rank among writers of fiction. While it is no part of a novelist's duty to inculcate that everything happens for the best in this best of all possible worlds, neither should he close his eyes to the fact that there is a good deal of substantial happiness to be obtained here below. The Emancipated is notable for the number of broken or marred lives it depicts. People are emancipated from false ideas of religion, from false principles of art, from the thralldom of false love; and, indeed, all through the story one character or another is in process of emancipation of some kind. Quite early we are introduced to Cecily Doran, who belongs to the intellectually emancipated. "She is as far above the Girtton girl as that interesting creature is above the product of an establishment for young ladies." She has no prejudices, and preserves a perfectly open mind. "She is familiar with the Latin classics and with the Parisian feuilletons; she knows all about the newest religion, and can tell you Sarcey's opinion of the newest play," &c. Yet this knowing and versatile creature links her fate with one Reuben Elgar, from whose nature even the faintest traces of morality seem to have been erased. A more sad and hopeless marriage it would be impossible to conceive. It ends with the death of Elgar, killed by a Parisian with whose actress-wife he has formed a liaison. Elgar was the man who began to write a great book, showing that throughout intellectual England Puritanism is dead, but that it vigorously survives among the half-educated classes. His work was to declare the emancipation of all better minds. Emancipation it was, indeed, for his long-suffering wife when a tragedy snapped for her the marriage chain. Then there is a young widow who has been brought up in Dissenting circles in Lancashire. She promises in her zeal to build a new chapel for her friends; but subsequently she becomes emancipated from all her old beliefs by travel, and finds salvation in noble Italian statues and pictures by the old masters. The fact is she has mistaken the husks of religion, as exhibited in the vulgarity and narrow-mindedness of its professors, for the kernel, with which these have nothing to do. Further still, we have an artist who, in gloomily anticipating his own epitaph, speaks of himself as one who had spent all his strength on a task which he knew to be vain; who suffered much and joyed rarely, and whose happiest day was his last. This character, however, is not finally wrecked; there is more happiness in store for him than he imagined. The novel is unquestionably clever, and well worth reading. If a little overcharged with misery, it is at any rate suggestive and striking in parts. It is the production of a man who can think, and who can express himself with unconventional force and freedom.

Miss Drewry has dealt with an aristocratic feud extending over two generations in For Somebody's Sake. She tells how it was finally and happily settled in a love affair, as it originally began in one between two rivals, the Earl of Ernescliffe and Mr. St. Maur. She also shows what sacrifices brothers may be capable of making for each other through the strength of mutual affection. Indeed, it seems to us that by far the best portion of the story is that in which the devotion of Max Darrell to his afflicted brother Cecil is described. The other characters all partake more or less of the nature of lay figures. The money lender Eustace Lemaire, and his daughter Madeline, beget in us little sympathy, being evidently pressed in as adjuncts to give the novel its regulation length. Lemaire's conduct on more than one occasion seems absurd and illogical. We ought, perhaps, not to be astonished that Ernescliffe fell in love with his whilom bitterest enemy, Victorine St. Maur, when there was observable in her "the rich melody of a masculine force and independence running through all the perfect harmonies of most graceful womanhood"; when there were "wild strains and full passionate chords," but "all was music." Yet Ernescliffe contradicts his own supposed chivalrous nature when he temp's Digby Arden into foolish courses to get influence over him. High life figures conspicuously in this novel, and no doubt it will enjoy its vogue at the libraries.

A bright and most entertaining story is The Nugents of Carriconna. Mr. Tighe Hopkins has a keen sense of humour, and is fully alive to the presence of that quality in the Hibernian character. He describes his work as being "more or less Irish," but we should say it is distinctly "more." Old Anthony Nugent, the last representative of a long line of owners of Carriconna, comes into a large sum of money left by his brother in Australia, who has disinherited his only daughter. Among the first uses to which Anthony puts his wealth is the purchase of a large telescope, which he fixes high up in a tower on the Carriconna property. Knowing nothing about astronomy, he advertises for an assistant. The person he engages, a pretty young widow named Mrs. Dora Lytton, turns out to be his brother's disinherited daughter. The telescope is the first cause of many amusing episodes, and of one serious one. Nugent's old servant, Maher, declines to look through the instrument. "I'm not for prying after the Saints," he says, "till I'm sent to join them." The first discovery which Nugent makes with the telescope is not of a sidereal but of a strictly terrestrial nature. Far away, in a remote corner of his estate, he detects a number of worthless scamps stealing peat, and he is able to put a surprisingly rapid stop to their depredations. There is an attractive love-story between Nugent's son Arthur and a thoroughly charming Irish girl, Lady Kitty Chenevix, and a second one between Dora and a Mr. Trenchard, whom Mrs. Lytton rescues from the terrible habit of opium-eating. All the people in this novel are admirably drawn, and the story never flags in interest.

Miss Monro has proved herself to be an excellent and wholesome writer, with no slight gift of observation of character. These qualities are apparent in Briers, though we should like to have seen them expended upon worthier objects. The pretended widow, the bewitching Nina Black, is a mere surface beauty with no heart; and Maurice Dale, whom she captivates, is one of those exasperating young men who are always ruffling one's feathers by their folly and inanity. However, we can set against these May Denison and Louis Raymond, who manage to lift the story out of the commonplace. The sketches of village life are very well done, and a certain amount of interest is kept up through the two volumes; but, as a whole, the novel is scarcely equal to previous works by the same hand. There are several peculiarities and lapses; for example, half way through the first volume the pretty widow writes to a person whom she styles mon ami, that she is leading a decorous life in a quiet village, where "all the parsons' wives and other old cats in the neighbourhood come to call on me"; but nothing is ever heard of this friend again. Miss Monro is fond of poetical quotations, yet in more than one instance the initials of the authors laid under contribution are inaccurately given.

The central figure of Danielo Cortis is evidently a leading Italian statesman, whose portrait has been lovingly and carefully drawn by one who knew him. His career is very interesting; and after many ups and downs, in which affairs of the heart mingle, we last behold him devoting himself to the cause of a rejuvenated Italy with all the warmth and ardour of his Southern constitution. The translation is executed with spirit.

Rita's "shilling shocker," A Society Scandal, will, no doubt, have a considerable vogue. A beautiful, aristocratic young lady marries a man more than double her age, and meets her "fate" in an indescribably handsome actor, Gordon Hayes. They go perilously near the verge of wrong, and, of course, a good deal of scandal is created. In the end Hayes is killed in a duel fought with a friend and relative of Lady Moira's. If it were worth while, several questions might be raised as to the folly of more than one character in the sketch, but this is unnecessary with merely ephemeral literature. Why should Rita have permitted such an utterly foolish sneer against Robert Browning's works as the remark that with the exception of "The Ring and the Book," there is "no poetry in any of his compositions, while some are atrocious?" Such judgments only engender contempt for the minds which presume to form them.

The story which gives its title to Messrs. Murray and Herman's volume, Paul Jones's Alias, is clever and ingenious, though there is nothing very exalted in two British officers being leagued together in swindling transactions. But the sketch itself is stirring and vigorous, with not a few very natural touches in it. "Mate in Two Moves" is another smart novelette—a case of diamond cut diamond, in which a pretty adventuress gets all the worst of it. The authors of these stories are excellent collaborators, and we should like to see them give us something fully adequate to their powers, with a little less of the seamy side of nature as the groundwork.

Mr. Edward Bellamy is a writer with a personality of his own, and it is therefore always a pleasure to peruse his work. The mixture of the real and the supernatural in his romance of immortality called Miss Ludington's Sister is very deftly accomplished, but as the story is short it would be a pity to expose its plot. The reader must do that for himself, and it there is no question but that he will be thoroughly interested.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

SOME LOCAL HISTORIES.

The History of the Parish of Rochdale. By Henry Fishwick. (Rochdale: Olegg; London: Elliot Stock.) Mr. Fishwick—who has long ago established his reputation as a painstaking genealogist of the County Palatine—here gives us a local history which in scale and in plan is not unworthy of being compared with its models of the last century. The impulse to the work we may believe to have come from the late Canon Raines, for many years vicar of Milnrow, within Rochdale, who bequeathed to the Chetham Library forty-four volumes of MS. notes. But Mr. Fishwick is indebted to him only for the example of research at first hand, never trusting to earlier authorities, but verifying all his facts from the original documents. Apart from his work on other local histories, he had previously prepared the way for the present book by putting into print the early registers of Rochdale, which go back to 1582. And—as might be expected—the most valuable chapters are those which deal in great detail with the old houses and old families of the neighbourhood. For of history in the common sense it must be confessed that Rochdale has little to boast. The very name is that of a tract of country rather than of a town. Situated on the border of the high moorland that separates Lancashire from Yorkshire—our sole complaint against the author is that he gives us no map—Rochdale was little more than a market town until the close of the last century, though its woollen industry is of much older date. Not incorporated until 1836, it is now a county borough. The most interesting fact in its early history is its connexion with the Barons Byron of Rochdale, who remained lords of the manor until the poet sold the last of his disputed rights in 1823. In our days, it is best known as the home of John Bright—whose father settled here in 1802, nine years before the birth of his famous son—and for the great co-operative association called the Rochdale Pioneers. During its brief history as a parliamentary borough, it has had for representatives Richard Cobden and Edward Miall, while Mr. T. B. Potter has sat continuously since 1865. The effect of household suffrage is strikingly shown by the number of votes that put Mr. Potter at the top of the poll in 1865 and again in 1868, being 646 in the former year, compared with 4455 in the latter. But these are not the sort of subjects with which Mr. Fishwick is mainly concerned. His delight is to record the history from contemporary documents of the numerous hamlets into which the extensive parish has always been divided, to print lists of the population at various early dates, or to trace the genealogy of an old Rochdale family down to the present days. As examples of his method may be taken his treatment of the claim of a late lord of the manor to be sprung from a knight who fought at Agincourt, supported, as the claim was, by fictitious tombstones and spurious heraldry; or his authenticated pedigree of the manufacturing house of Fielden from a Rochdale yeoman of the reign of Elizabeth. The volume is illustrated with some half-dozen plates, and numerous woodcuts, most of which represent the old halls as they appeared not so many years ago; but, alas! it seems that hardly any of them now remain. In fact, we should not be disposed to recommend the neighbourhood of Rochdale to the lover either of architecture or of the picturesque. But as the ancient home of plain, sturdy, middle-class folk, with as long a descent as those whom our author oddly calls "booted" earls, the town has found a worthy record in this handsome quarto.

Cromer, Past and Present. By Walter Rye. (Norwich: Jarrold.) Not quite so stately in form, but yet more handsomely printed and illustrated, is this donation of Mr. Walter Rye to the restoration fund of Cromer Church. Needless to say that he has willingly drawn upon his unrivalled stores of local learning to elucidate the history of the village from which his own ancestors are sprung. The keynote of the work is struck in the preface, where he describes, with the enthusiasm of a native, the appearance that the grand old church would have presented to a visitor three or four hundred years ago. For Cromer, recently but a fishing village and now a fashionable watering place, seems to have been a sea-port of some consequence in early days. The name goes back to the reign of Henry III; but Shipden, its predecessor—which tradition declares to have fallen into the sea—is duly recorded in Domesday. Perhaps the most interesting chapter is that entitled "The Old Traders and Townsmen," in which the author has brought together, from old records, a most unexpected amount of information about the life of the people and the vicissitudes of the place. The history of the church, its architecture and ornaments, its ruin and restoration, are also described with a loving hand. On the occasion of a former restoration in 1767, the Bishop of Norwich granted a faculty to sell four out of five bells, and the lead off the roof, towards paying the expense of repairs. The bells realised £197, and the lead as much as £312. Towards the present restoration £7,546 has already been subscribed. In an appendix Mr. Rye has given every inscription in the churchyard, notes of all the feet of fines relating to Shipden and Cromer, transcripts of all the subsidy rolls and poll-books, and a calendar of all the wills that manifestly relate to the parish in the Norwich register. For the benefit of those visitors to Cromer who are not genealogists, chapters are also added—from specialists—on the ornithology, geology, and botany. The parish registers, however, are passed over, and we could have spared the excursus on Mr. Scott Surtees's theory that Caesar landed in Norfolk. But those who know the extraordinary thoroughness of Mr. Walter Rye's workmanship will the most readily pardon him for introducing a personal element into the results which he so bountifully lays before the public.

History of Basingstoke. By F. J. Baigent and J. E. Millard. (Basingstoke: Jacob; London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co.) The little town of Basingstoke owes this massive volume of nearly 800 pages to the enthusiasm of its vicar and of one of the most indefatigable antiquaries in Hampshire. In itself, it must be admitted that Basingstoke does not offer many attractions. Known to most merely as a railway junction on a very awkward cross-journey, it has always derived such historical importance as it possesses from its position on the great route to the South-West. This comes out curiously in the churchwardens' accounts, where there are frequent entries of payments in connexion with the passage through the town of the corpse of some great personage on the way to burial. The siege of Basing House in the Civil War is scarcely an incident in the history of the town, from which the House was a few miles distant, and is very lightly touched upon in this volume. Nor has Basingstoke produced many great men. Undoubtedly its most distinguished alumnus was Walter de Merton, who founded here a hospital, which (in some way not explained) seems to have become annexed to his Oxford College. Mention may further be made of two former vicars—Sir George Wheler, the Greek traveller, and Thomas Warton, the father of two sons better known than himself; and also of Sir James Lancaster, the pioneer of English trade in the East Indies. By the way, Sir George bequeathed all his divinity books to the Church Library; and so late as 1723 chains were purchased for them. The library yet exists in a parlour over the south porch, but apparently not the chains. An ancient custom is still observed of the choir singing the "Old Hundredth" from the top of the church tower at midnight on New Year's Eve. Another old custom, which only died out forty years ago, was to ring a bell at 4 a.m. all the year through for labourers to begin their work. In 1715, the hour was altered to 5; but this was found prejudicial to the cloth-workers. These old customs lead us on to speak about what is probably the most valuable part of the present work—the copious extracts made by Mr. Baigent from early records illustrating the social life of the town. About 230 pages are occupied with such extracts, the most interesting of which relate to the Court or View of Frankpledge during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. One of the most important duties of this court appears to have been the abatement of nuisances, such as unscoured gutters in the town and foul ditches in the fields. A regular source of revenue seems to have been derived from the fine of a groat upon those free suitors who did not attend. Nor were great men, such as the Marquis of Winchester, exempted from the penalty. The stocks, the pillory, and the tumbrel or cucking-stool are carefully kept in repair, though we find no record of the actual use of this last. One entry of frequent occurrence has puzzled us. "We find a fault among the butchers that they killeth their bulls unbaited." It is not possible that the cause of complaint here is that the inhabitants were deprived of the pleasure of seeing a bull-bait. We would rather suppose that the flesh of an unbaited bull was not considered wholesome. It is notorious that the flesh of a hunted or coursed hare is more tender than that of one shot. Finally, though many other curious matters call for comment, we must be content with expressing our high opinion of the manner in which a book not very easy to produce has been issued by the local printer. We trust that encouragement may be given to the authors to publish a further instalment of local documents.

The History of Wellington. By Arthur L. Humphreys. (Henry Gray.) Wellington, in Somerset, has been equally fortunate with Basingstoke in preserving its position on the main route to the west now that railways have superseded coaches. Hence, probably, it is that its population has increased during the present century from 4033 to 6360, and that it has been able to maintain its old manufacture of serges as well as a thriving pottery. Even though travellers by rail may see the tall monument erected in 1817, we doubt whether many people know that it was from this little place, and not from the larger town of the same name in Salop, that the Great Duke took his title. What his motive was remains, so far as we know, undisclosed; but the fact is certain. The manor of Wellington was purchased for him out of moneys provided by Parliament in 1813; and in the following year he visited the town. Concerning this subject, the following letter, dated February 1, 1816, is here printed for the first time:

"I have received Mr. Kinglake's report. I have so little knowledge of my own affairs, and possessing no former report to which I can refer, I can form no opinion of it. My opinion has long been that I have either too much or too little property in the neighbourhood, and I will readily as depends on me follow your advice in increasing it either by way of enclosure," &c.

According to the "Modern Domesday Book" (Bateman, fourth edition, 1883), the late Duke of Wellington then held 529 acres in Somerset, valued at £817 a year. The only other historical name associated with Wellington is that of Sir John Popham, the chief justice of Elizabeth and James I., who built a great house here, and lies buried in the church, though popular tradition has connected him more closely with Littlecote, in Wilts. We should not forget to mention also that the late Thomas Spencer Baynes, editor of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, was born at Wellington, being the son of the Baptist minister there. Of these, as well as of many other local worthies, our author gives some account, together with an exceptionally full bibliography. He also tells us the little that can be ascertained about the part taken by Wellington in the Civil War and in the Monmouth Rebellion. The prevalent feeling was Puritan, as in the neighbouring towns of Taunton and Bridgwater; and to the present day the spot is pointed out where Jeffreys set up his gallows. Mr. Humphreys also gives extracts from the parish registers and the churchwardens' accounts, which do not contain much that is exceptional. Payments to wandering sailors are, of course, common; but "seaboy" is good, and so is the spelling "chanselar." Why should rewards have been paid for the extermination of hedgehogs? Could it have been to protect the dairy cows? A novel, but by no means unwelcome, feature is the chapter on folklore. The festival of Bishop Blaize, as the patron saint of wool-combers, was celebrated as late as forty years ago; but Guy Fawkes Day is a very modern revival. Needless to say that the belief in witchcraft and similar superstitions has not yet died out, at least among the country folk. The ceremony of wassailing the apple orchard on Twelfth Night is said to be obsolete. Altogether, Mr. Humphreys may be congratulated on having produced a very painstaking and, at the same time, readable volume.

The Annals of the Parish of Swainswick. By R. E. M. Peach. (Sampson Low.) Swainswick—pronounced Swanswick—is a village near Bath, and has thus been fortunate enough to attract the notice of the historian of that city, Mr. Peach. The larger part, however, of the present book consists of a transcript of the parochial documents, made several years ago by an old resident, the late Mrs. Henley Jervis. Of these, the most novel are the poor rate book accounts, from 1661 downwards, which reveal interesting details about village life in former times. It might be possible to follow the story of some of the "base" children here recorded from the cradle to the grave. The churchwardens' accounts, though particularly full, do not contain much that might not be paralleled elsewhere. Payment for foxes, "grays" (i.e. badgers), and ravens is common; and the parish also had its own sparrow-catcher. In 1647, the church library contained three Books of Martyrs, one Great Bible, Bishop Jewell's Works, and Erasmus's Paraphrase; but we do not hear of these books again. Mr. Peach's chief care has been to trace the descent of the manor, principally from the muniments at Oriel College; and in particular to record faithfully all the details that can be ascertained about the one great man whom Swainswick has produced, William Prynne. The pedigrees are also given of several other local families, such as the Hyde-Clarks and the Gunnings.

Records of Yarlington: being the History of a Country Village. By T. E. Rogers. (Elliot Stock.) The sub-title of this book is misleading, for the author has altogether omitted to tell us anything about the life of the villagers, though, surely, he must possess some materials in the parish register, the churchwardens' accounts, and the court rolls. But for what he has done he deserves our best thanks. His title-deeds, apparently, go back to the middle of the sixteenth century, when the manor of Yarlington was forfeited to the crown on the attainder of Margaret, Countess of Salisbury, the last of the Montagues. It was then granted by the king as part of the dower of Katharine Parr; and the reversion was purchased by Sir Thomas Smith, of whom the author oddly writes: "Wood says he was Provost of Eton," as if there were not abundant evidence for the fact. After some ten years, Sir Thomas sold, at a greatly advanced price, to one of the old Somerset family of Rosewell. The next owner, at a price again doubled, was Sir Maurice Berkeley, of Bruton (1592), from whom the property descended through the Godolphins to that Marquis of Carmarthen who figures prominently in memoirs of the second half of the last century. From him the ancestor of the present owner bought in 1782. The most interesting part of the book is the chapter dealing with the disputed succession of Jael Berkeley—a name and character which we commend to the notice of Mr. Baring-Gould. There is also mention of a curious right annexed to the park called "the deer's leap," according to which the Montacute lords claimed all timber growing within six feet from the sheer of the outside ditch.

The Parish Church of St. Mary, Whaplode. By W. E. Foster. (Elliot Stock.) As with the well-known watering-place of Cromer, so with this remote fen-village, the old church is the occasion of this historical work. There is, indeed, very little to be told about Whaplode except in connexion with its church, the earliest portions of which were built by the monks of Croyland early in the twelfth century. Whatever is to be gleaned from the Croyland MSS. and from local documents is here carefully recorded by Mr. Foster, with architectural woodcuts. The church was restored between 1843 and 1846; and, apparently, the roof is again in need of repair. Some of the stories told about the wild character of the parishioners in former days remind one of Mary Lamb's paper entitled "First Going to Church"; and one would like to know more of the relations between the mother parish and the hamlet of Whaplode Drove, some seven miles distant.

Memories of Hurstwood, Burnley, Lancashire. By Tattersall Wilkinson and J. F. Tattersall. (Burnley: J. & A. Lupton.) This little Lancashire village has some interesting traditional associations, and to these the authors yield a more unquestioning faith than will be accorded by all their readers. The local site of the battle of Brunanburh, the residence of Spenser the poet at Hurstwood, and the going forth from this quiet corner of the founder of "Tattersalls," are not all equally well authenticated. But the authors have added to this historical element a considerable amount of folklore and popular mythology. The history of the Tattersalls should have some attraction for sporting men as well as genealogists. The book, if not of first-rate importance, is a satisfactory performance, and is very handsomely printed and illustrated.

The History of Kennington. By H. H. Montgomery. (Hamilton Adams & Co.) When compared with the volumes noticed above, this is a very modest production; for it consists of articles printed from a parish magazine, without any attempt at orderly narrative. The writer—a former vicar, and at one time in the Cambridge eleven—is now Bishop of Tasmania; and, though he puts his surname on the title-page, some of the notes are initialled T. Mainly from antiquarian books, but partly also from conversation with old inhabitants, he has here brought together a quantity of miscellaneous information about Kennington. The site of an old royal palace, and still a manor belonging to the Duchy of Cornwall, Kennington has not a few points of contact with the English court. Its common, now sadly diminished, was once the scene of execution for Surrey criminals, and in the present century became historical as the meeting-place of the Chartists. Its area included Vauxhall, and also the Surrey-gardens of our own childhood; while the laying-out of the Oval as a cricket-field in 1844 has given the author an excuse to record some cricket-gossip that has no connexion with Kennington. But, though the book is badly put together, and contains several inconsistencies and repetitions, we can well believe that it will be valued as a memorial of the interest which Dr. Montgomery took in everything associated with his parish.

History of the Parish of St. Peter Permuntersgate, Norwich. By the Rev. W. Hudson. (Norwich: Goose.) Like the preceding, this little book also appeared originally in a parish magazine. But there all resemblance ends; for the author is one of the most painstaking antiquaries in a city and a county prolific of such, and the unrivalled series of records in the possession of the Norwich corporation has enabled him to give most minute details of what he modestly calls "a walk round the district six hundred years ago." Prefixed is a clear sketch-map; and in an appendix we have two of the original deeds, with their contractions expanded, and translation—an excellent lesson for beginners. We may add that the strange title of the parish is derived from the "gate" or "street" of the "parmenters," who are variously interpreted as being "tailors" or "skinners"; and that the name of St. Vedast's—an extinct parish formerly included within its boundaries—is still preserved in St. Faith's-lane, as also in Foster-lane in the city of London.

We have also to acknowledge a new edition of Mr. S. G. Jarman's painstaking History of Bridgewater (Elliot Stock), which was reviewed in the ACADEMY of October 12, 1889.

NOTES AND NEWS.

We learn that Messrs. Bell have in the press a new play by Michael Field, to be entitled The Tragic Mary—a phrase adopted from Mr. Pater's Essay on Rossetti. The play treats of the fortunes of Mary Stuart from Rizzio's death to the field of Carberry Hill. Her character is shaped between the extremes of crime and innocence; she is Helen rather than Clytemnestra. A design for the cover of the volume has been made by Mr. Selwyn Image.

MR. H. RIDER HAGGARD is seeing through the press an "essay in verse," entitled Life and its Author, which was written some years ago by his mother, Mrs. Haggard of Bradenham, who died last December. The volume will contain a memoir and a portrait, and will be published by Messrs. Longmans.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN will publish immediately a volume of Durham Sermons, by the late Bishop Lightfoot.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co. have in the press a volume of Lectures on the History of the Reformation, by the late Canon Aubrey Moore, and also a second series of essays as a companion volume to his well-known Science and the Faith.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will publish shortly, under the title of The Genesis of the United States, a narrative of the movement in England, 1605-1616, which resulted in the plantation of North America by Englishmen, compiled by Mr. Alexander Brown, member of the Virginia Historical Society. The story is set forth in a series of historical manuscripts, together with a re-issue of rare contemporary tracts, accompanied by bibliographical memoranda, notes, plans, portraits, and a comprehensive biographical index. Of 365 documents used, 294 are now for the first time published. These have been drawn from a variety of sources, both public and private, and include letters from Philip III. of Spain, Zuniga, Newport, Salisbury, Raleigh, Captain John Smith, Velasco, Digby, Gondomar, Molino, &c.; and also passages from the records of the Grocers, Mercers, Merchant Taylors, Fishmongers, and other Companies concerned in the colonising movement.

THE Authors' Co-operative Publishing Company will issue in May, in a limited edition, the Hon. Roden Noel's Livingstone in Africa, with an introductory poem on Stanley, illustrated by Mr. Hume Nisbet.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & Co. are about to publish a memoir of Thomas Davis, the Irish nationalist poet, by his early friend, Sir Charles Gavan Duffy. Thomas Davis was the most distinguished of a notable group of writers, who nearly fifty years ago inspired the mind of Young Ireland with loftier and more specific political aims. This memoir will, we hear, be rich in the political and literary correspondence of the period.

THE same publishers will shortly issue a new book by Mark Rutherford, author of "The Revolt in Tanner's-lane." It will consist of a couple of stories and some other papers.

MR. DAVID NUTT will publish in the course of the spring:—The Women of Turkey and their Folklore: Reminiscences of Eight Years' Travel and Sojourn in the Ottoman Empire, Asiatic and European, by Lucy M. J. Garnett, with an Introduction on the Ethnography of Turkey, by Mr. J. S. Stuart-Glennie (in two volumes); Views and Reviews: Essays in Appreciation—Literature, by Mr. W. E. Henley (a few copies will be printed on Japanese paper); a second instalment of Dr. Sommer's edition of the Morte Darthur, comprising bibliographical introduction, list of various readings, notes on Malory's language, index raisonné of personages, glossary, &c.; The Origins of Civilisation, by Mr. J. S. Stuart-Glennie; An Attic Vocabulary, by E. Dawes, &c. In the "Tudor Library," More's Life of Pius and the Elizabethan version of Daphnis and Chloe will be issued immediately. The reprint of Painter's Palace of Pleasure and Mr. Jacobs's edition of Howell's Letters are fast approaching completion, and may be looked for in the summer.

A SECOND edition, for private circulation only, has been issued of the Rev. W. H. Milman's useful Order of the Classification of Zion College, London.

WHAT with newspaper syndicates and the ordinary forms of book publication, the English novelist has a far-reaching public. The Bondman is shortly to appear in the series of English books published by Baron Tauchnitz. A German translation is also in progress; and Messrs. Petherick have just issued their colonial edition, with a memoir of the author by Mr. R. Lee Campbell. Besides these, and the three editions published by Mr. Heinemann, there have been as many editions published in America, the authorised one by Messrs. Lovell & Co. We suppose that the novel of a popular author syndicated by Messrs. Tillotson might easily cover twenty-five newspapers at home, in Australia, Canada, and India. These forms of publication taken altogether must represent an enormous reading public for a successful story.

At the Easter Vestry just held at Chiswick, on the motion of Dr. Gordon Hogg, the surveyor was instructed to prepare plans and estimate for a fireproof strong-room, to contain the various documents belonging to the parish. The Chiswick records are numerous, and the churchwardens' accounts go back to 1620.

At the next meeting of the Browning Society, to be held at University College, Gower-street, on April 25, a paper will be read by Dr. E. Berdoe on "The Pope and Caponsacchi" ("Ring and the Book"). Prof. H. Johnson will take the chair.

The Browning Society has bought for its members two hundred copies of the large paper edition of Mr. William Sharp's Life of Browning. They will go out with the next issue of the Society's Papers, and will be accompanied by a leaf of corrections and notes by Dr. Furnivall.

ON Wednesday next, April 23, Messrs. Sotheby will begin the sale—which will last altogether for eight days—of what is described as a portion of the library of Mr. Thomas Gaisford, of Offington, Worthing. As befits a member of the Roxburghe Club and the Philobiblon Society, this very interesting collection consists almost entirely of such rarities as enthusiasts most affect, bound in the choicest style. Perhaps its most characteristic feature is the large number of French and Spanish romances, Italian rappresentazioni, and English song-books. But no department of curious literature is unrepresented. Of English books there are not only the four folios of Shakspeare, but also several of the rarest quartos; a fine series of the illustrated works of Blake; and—among moderns—first editions of Burns, Coleridge, Shelley, Byron, Keats, Leigh Hunt, Tennyson, Browning, Coventry, Patmore, Matthew Arnold, and Swinburne. We may also mention Poliphili Hypnerotomachia (Venice, 1499); the Chronicon Nurembergense (Nuremberg, 1493); early Dantes, Boccaccios, and Ariostos; the first edition of Lucretius with a date (Verona, 1486); and the Rheims New Testament. There are, besides, a large number of those books (old and new) which owe their rarity to artificial reasons.

THE eleventh part of the new critical edition of the Massoretic Hebrew text of the Old Testament, edited by Baer & Delitzsch, has just appeared. It contains the Book of Jeremiah, and has a special interest to all friends and admirers of the late Prof. Delitzsch from the fact that the preface (written by him) is dated "versus finem Januarii." A touching description is given of the circumstances of the writer's last illness.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

A NEW series of East and West will be started with the May number, to be published henceforth by Mr. William Heinemann. The magazine will be considerably enlarged, and the price raised to one shilling. Mr. W. E. Norris begins a serial novel, and contributions from other well-known writers are promised.

THE Figaro Illustré will henceforth be published monthly, taking the place, on a less magnificent scale, of Les Lettres et les Arts. Besides numerous illustrations in black and white, each part will have six coloured plates and a piece of music. The English publishers are Messrs. Bousso, Valadon & Co., of the Goupil Gallery.

THE May number of the National Review will contain a poem by Mr. Alfred Austin, entitled "On Returning to England."

A FIRST instalment of the Rhind Lectures on "The Ethnology of Early Scotland," delivered at Edinburgh last winter by Prof. Rhys, will appear in the forthcoming number of the Scottish Review, which will also contain an important article on "Coptic Church Music," by Archpriest Hatherly.

THE May number of the Antiquary will contain the first part of Mrs. Baldwin Obilde's account of the rebuilding of the manor house of Kyril Park, near Tenbury, in the reign of Elizabeth, taken from the original MSS.; the beginning of an elaborate supplement to Haines' Manual of Monumental Brasses, by Mr. Edleston; an account of the singular monolith at the Ladies' Glen on the Malvern Hills, by the late Mr. H. H. Lines; "Of a Fool and his Folly there is no End," a paper on Court Fools, by the Hon. H. Dillon; a review of discoveries at Rome during 1889, by the Rev. J. Hirst; and an illustrated continuation of the conference on that vexed question of ecclesiologists, "Low Side Windows."

GEORGE WASHINGTON is the subject of three papers in the Century, treating specially of the portraits of him and other personal relics. An engraving of the portrait by James Wright will form the frontispiece. Another article is devoted to Marie Bashkirtseff, which will be illustrated with a portrait and with reproductions of some of her pictures.

Scribner's for May will have an article on Millet and the Barbizon school, by Mr. T. H. Bartlett; and a contemporary account of the coronation of the first Napoleon, by an American visitor to Paris in 1804.

THE May number of the United Service Magazine will contain a poem by Mr. A. O. Swinburne, and an article on "The Easter Manœuvres" by a well-known military critic.

"JOHN STRANGE WINTER" (Mrs. Arthur Stannard) is the subject of an article, illustrated by a portrait, by Mr. Frederick Dolman, in the forthcoming number of the Woman's World.

THE first instalment of a new serial story by L. T. Meade, entitled "In the Second Place," will appear in the May number of the Quiver, in which the Revs. W. M. Statham, J. P. Gladstone, W. M. Johnston, Prebendary Gordon Calthrop, and Dr. J. B. Macduff contribute papers particularly adapted for Sunday reading. This part also contains the commencement of a new story by the Rev. B. P. Power, entitled "The Dreams of Dr. Fayding."

ORIGINAL VERSE.

MAID APRIL.

(AFTER a term of gloriously fine clear weather, Good Friday dawned in a lovely robe of haze, which hung over Derwentwater and the surrounding hills throughout the whole day, lending illusory magic of the most perfect kind to the magnificent scenery.)

WHERE is she whom we fain would praise
Through moonlit eves in woodland ways,
Through lyric morns on rimy hills,
Through noons among the daffodils?

You see, enwoven of the dew,
A gauzy curtain, dimly blue,
Hung round and round the sleepy vales.
Well, if you could that curtain raise,
You might have sight of her these days,
When glad auroral sunshine pales
The western hills, and thrushes sing
The ever welcome psalm of spring,
(Which mortals cannot, dare not speak)
And echoes answer from each peak.

Ah, yes! shy April, she is there,
Of all the blossom months most fair;
And she is busy with the bud
And curling frond; and, if she would Draw back the tender veil of haze,
We might upon her magic gaze.

But, no! she works unseen, alone;
She writes God's lessons on a stone,
And teaches all the waking trees
To murmur of His mysteries:
Thus silently, behind the mist,
She kisses those she always kissed.

JOHN WALKER.

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM MASKELL.

MR. WILLIAM MASKELL, a writer equally well known for his controversial zeal, his erudition in ancient English liturgies, and his knowledge on all artistic subjects, died at Penzance on April 12, aged 76.

His father was a solicitor at Shepton Mallet, Somerset, and he himself was born in that county. He graduated at University College, Oxford, and was beneficed at first in the diocese of Salisbury; but his most important charge was the vicarage of St. Marychurch, near Torquay, where he speedily made the acquaintance of and was admitted to the inner circle surrounding Bishop Phillpotts. It fell to his lot, as chaplain to the bishop, to examine Mr. Gorham, who had then quitted the benefice of St. Just in Penwith for that of Brampford Speke, near Exeter; and he then pronounced him unsound in his views on baptismal regeneration, whereupon the bishop refused to institute him in his new living. The trials which followed had the double effect of securing Gorham in his benefice and of causing Maskell, in company with many other learned clergymen of the Church of England, to leave its communion for that of the Church of Rome. His domestic circumstances forbade his assuming any clerical charge in that body, and for many years he resided mostly at Bude, where he had a few years before acquired some property. Latterly he lived at Penzance, and there he died.

Mr. Maskell published a number of sermons, pamphlets, and reviews. In the height of the Gorham controversy he intervened with two letters on "The Present Position of the High Church Party in the Church of England," each of which reached a second edition in 1850, and with a reprint of the correspondence on the subject which he had carried on with Bishop Phillpotts and Archbishop Sumner. Twenty years later he found himself ill at ease in his new creed. When the question of papal infallibility was on the point of being exalted into a dogma of the Church, he published "A Letter to the Editor of the Dublin Review upon the Temporal Power of the Pope and his Personal Infallibility" (1869), and followed it up with a "Copy of Correspondence with Archbishop Manning on the Obligations of the Definition of the Vatican Council" (1870), and with "What is the Meaning of the Late Definition of the Infallibility of the Pope?" In liturgies and science books he was well read. He published in turn Selected Centuries of Books from his Library (1843), Catalogue of Books used in or relating to Public Services of the Church of England in the 16th and 17th Centuries (1845), Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England according to the Various Uses (2nd ed., 1846, 3rd ed., 1882), and Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesiae Anglicanae; or, Occasional Offices of the Church of England according to Sarum Uses (1846-47, 3 vols., and 2nd ed., 1882). His volume on the History of the Martin Marprelate Controversy (1845) should still be read in conjunction with Prof. Arber's work dealing with the same subject from a different point of view.

At Bude Mr. Maskell dwelt near and became very friendly with that eccentric genius, R. S. Hawker. They were both of them learned in ancient theology, both of them enthusiastic in praise of the scenery and history of that part of North-east Cornwall, and both helped by every means in their power the mariners wrecked on its fretted coast. Maskell issued in 1863 an extremely rare pen-and-ink sketch of "Bude Haven," which was afterwards included in his little volume of Odds and Ends (1872). When his friend died, and two adventurous scribes, on the strength of a slight acquaintance with the life and character of the parson of Morwenstowe, rushed into print with memoirs of the dead poet, Mr. Maskell tore to pieces the two editions of the more pretentious volume of the two in a series of articles in the columns of the Athenaeum, which were afterwards reprinted for private circulation.

During his visits to London, Mr. Maskell composed A Description of the Ivories at the South Kensington Museum (1872), a subject on which he was one of our chief authorities; and he also found time to edit a series of South Kensington art handbooks. Until a year or two ago his fine figure was constantly seen in the libraries and clubs of London.

JOHN R. WISE.

WE regret also to record the death of Mr. John R. Wise, the historian of the New Forest, on April 2, in the sixtieth year of his age. Though not a resident, he died at Lyndhurst; and there, at his own wish, he lies buried amid the scenery that he knew and loved and described so well.

His first book, we believe, was Shakespeare: his Birthplace and its Neighbourhood (1861). This was soon followed by the work to which he devoted many years of his life, and which will long keep his memory sweet—The New Forest: its History and its Scenery, which possesses an additional interest as having been illustrated by Mr. Walter Crane, in a style very different to that adopted by this artist in his later years. The first edition appeared in 1863, and a second in 1879. But that most sought after by collectors is the "artist's edition" of 1883, to which Mr. Heywood Sumner added twelve etchings, and which has Mr. W. J. Linton's woodcuts mounted on India paper. Another book in which Mr. Wise and Mr. Walter Crane collaborated was The First of May (1881), a portfolio of fifty-two plates, designed by Mr. Walter Crane in his most decorative style to illustrate a fairy masque which, though no name is given on the title-page, we have always understood to be written by Mr. Wise.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

The contents of the current number of Mind are of more than usual interest. Dr. Maudsley leads off with an article on "The Cerebral Cortex and its Work." Much of this is not new, and the reader might well have been spared another reference, albeit only in a footnote, to the religious hallucinations of Swedenborg. At the same time, the article is on the whole eminently readable and suggestive. Of special value is the carrying forward of the idea that all nervous action is reflex, so as to regard thoughts themselves as at bottom cortical reflexes. The essayist cannot, of course, abstain from the customary sneer at "pure psychology." He seems to think we might study psycho-physical processes without making any use of common psychological language. But nature cannot so easily be pitchforked out of the scene. While the writer refuses to accept the results of properly psychological analysis, and to adjust physiological facts to these, we find him compelled to endow a physical process itself with the highest attributes of mind. And so we have him talking about "general or abstract movements." The pure psychologist owes Dr. Maudsley much. The second article of the number is a sympathetic yet discriminating examination of "Lotze's Moral Idealism," by Mr. G. Santayana. The article is a skilful bit of critical exposition, and is written in a style worthy of its subject. The essayist evidently leans strongly to Lotze's idea of reconciling science and the demands of feeling. Yet he sees clearly enough, what Lotze did not see, that this reconciliation is complicated by the fact that feeling or moral and aesthetic instinct is a highly variable phenomenon, and changes as certainly as, even if more slowly than, the intellectual view of things itself. The remaining article, by Dr. James Ward, on "The Progress of Philosophy," is a spirited and timely protest against the common notion that, while science is ever moving forward, philosophy is performing a sort of boomerang movement, returning to the point from which it set out. Allowing for differences of subject-matter, the writer thinks that philosophy has advanced "about as much" as science. Much that is adduced in support of this contention is forcible and just. As Dr. Ward reminds us, science has been emancipated not by the savant, but by the philosopher himself. This, however, is far from being decisive. A mother-country may voluntarily cede independence to its colonies with the result of rendering their progress more strikingly opposed to its own comparative stationariness. Again, it is no doubt to the point to say that one of the old sages of Miletus, or even Descartes, if restored to life now, would find himself more at home with the highest generalisations of modern physics than with our modern philosophy. At the same time, the reflective reader cannot help asking whether the Ionian or, for that matter, Descartes, would so readily grasp any modern scientific truth as we have learnt to grasp it, viz., as a result of what we now understand as a rigorously scientific investigation. Can we conceive of Aristotle himself readily apprehending the doctrine of natural selection as Darwin, and every trained biologist since Darwin, apprehends it? There is a good deal to be said for the Oxford contention that a nineteenth-century student of philosophy is best initiated in the arcana of his craft by a study of Plato and Aristotle. But who would contend that a student of physical science should begin, we do not say with Aristotle, but, say, with Descartes, or even some later authority? Dr. Ward, ingenious as he undoubtedly is, hardly succeeds in showing that modern philosophic research is as alien to ancient as modern scientific research is to what in ancient times usurped its place. And one cannot well see why anybody should be concerned to establish so difficult a position. Even if the fundamental problems of philosophy—such as "What is knowledge, and by what criterion can we judge of its certainty? Is knowledge of the particular or of the general?" and the like—remain the same in substance, only undergoing certain changes in form, this fact may after all make for the true and distinctive glory of philosophy.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ROBERT BROWNING'S ANCESTORS.

3, St. George's Square, N.W.: April 15, 1890.

As Mr. Gray's reference to my pamphlet in his review of Mr. Sharp's Life of Browning (ACADEMY, April 12, p. 245, col. 1) may lead your readers to suppose that I am partly responsible for the myth that the poet was connected with Micaiah Browning, 1689, and with the captain who commanded Henry V.'s ship, I ask leave to state that these men and the poet were only namesakes, and that Micaiah and the captain have been annexed simply to cover the humble origin of the poet.

His first forefather that we know of, Robert I., was head butler, doubtless after being footboy and footman, to Sir J. Bankes, of Corfe Castle, Dorsetshire. Robert's brother Thomas was tenant of an inn—Woodvates Inn—in a very small hamlet of Dorsetshire, under Lord Shaftesbury, in whose family he may well have been a servant. At any rate, Robert I.'s son, Thomas II., succeeded Thomas I. in the tenancy of Woodvates Inn, and was the great grandfather of the poet. Robert I.'s wife, Elizabeth, could not sign her name to her will; and her grandson, Robert II.'s son, was apprenticed to a stonemason at Wimborne. Lord Shaftesbury, as the landlord of Thomas II., got his son, Robert III., the poet's grandfather, into the Bank of England. There the poet's father, Robert IV. (a half creole*), was a clerk also, and was a versatile, clever fellow. The rise of the family is a creditable one from the ranks; and it is a pity to try and tack it on to noteworthy namesakes who have nothing to do with it.

The Browning Society lets its members buy odd numbers of its papers at 3d. each; and if any of your readers want a copy of my paper on Browning's ancestors—with wills, extracts from registers, &c.—they can get it by sending 3d. and an addressed stamped wrapper to Clay and Sons, Bread-street-hill, London, E.C., and saying that they write in consequence of this letter.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

* The word "creole" is ambiguous. Its strict use, in both French and Spanish, is "a person of pure European blood born in the West Indies." In English there appears to be a secondary meaning—a person of whatever descent born in the West Indies. But in the present case we understand the word to be applied in a third (and unauthorised) sense, to express a mixed negro parentage.—ED. ACADEMY.

THE HARLEIAN MS., 7334 (CHAUCER).

Cambridge: April 14, 1890.

The considerable value of this MS. of the Canterbury Tales has been generally admitted; in fact, it forms the basis of the editions by Wright, Jephson (Bell), and Morris.

I wish to point out the very great service which Dr. Furnivall has rendered to all Chaucer scholars by his accurate and valuable reprint of it for the Chaucer Society. I do not think he is fully aware of the boon he has thus conferred upon some of us. In fact, his apology for undertaking it becomes quite unnecessary when the facts of the case dawn upon us. It could hardly have been guessed that we knew previously so very little about it.

To begin with. It so happens that the MS. has lost eight leaves. The only hint of this in Morris's edition is conveyed by the printing of two inconspicuous stars, one at the beginning of the last line on p. 373 of volume II, and one at the end of the last line but one on p. 16 of volume III. There is no explanation of the meaning of these stars, nor was any possible, as he was not allowed the use of footnotes. Another curious result is that between the end of vol. II. and the beginning of vol. III. the first 36 lines of the Franklin's Prologue have mysteriously disappeared altogether.

Wright's edition notices the lacuna, but in a very inconspicuous manner, and in a misleading way. His notice is distributed over two notes; one at l. 10,930 (in his numbering), telling us that he takes the rest of the Squire's Tale from the Lansdowne MS.; and one at l. 10,986, intimating a similar borrowing from Tyrwhitt as regards the beginning of the Franklin's Tale.

Again, Mr. Wright says that, in giving readings from other MSS., he has "always, when there is room for the least doubt, given the original reading of the MS. in a footnote." I have for years accepted this statement without question; but, now that it can be tested, it becomes obvious that it is impossible to assign any distinct meaning to the clause which I have printed in italics. As a fact, anyone who trusts to this reprint may be grievously misled.

A few examples will show this clearly. In the Knight's Tale, l. 783 (A. 1641), the MS. has:

"And hereth him comyng in the greues."

Mr. Wright prints this in the form:

"And hereth him come russhyng in the greves."

There is no footnote. Why not?

Thirteen lines lower, the MS. has:

"They foyneden ech at other longe."

Mr. Wright prints it thus:

"They foyneden ech at other, wonder longe."

There is no hint anywhere that "wonder" is not in the MS. Four lines lower "togeder" is similarly inserted. Mr. Jephson doubtless relied on Mr. Wright. In his preface, he waxes bold, and says: "All deviations, either from Mr. Wright's edition, or from the original MS., are pointed out in the footnotes for the ultimate satisfaction of the reader." Of this it can only be said that it is quite misleading as regards the MS.; as can be seen at once from the fact that the three above corrections are all silently copied.

Still clearer is the case in the next line to that last referred to. The MS. has:

"That frothen white as fome frothe wood."

Here "frothe" is a stupid repetition; and the right reading is "for ire." The two above editions both print "for ire"; but there is not a word about the MS. reading.

I regret to say that I have at last realised that neither of these editions tell us what the MS. really has, in a large number of instances.

This is the more to be regretted because Mr. Wright's edition, especially, is very faithful upon the whole. It sometimes gives the MS. correctly for fifty lines together; but—we cannot tell when.

Dr. Morris did his best to remedy this; but the absence of footnotes rendered it impossible to show the original readings of the MS. In the cases cited, he endeavoured to show all alterations by printing them in italics. The weak point of this endeavour was that it was extremely easy to miss a variation, or for his printer to ignore his mark. Take the four instances above, and note the result.

In the first case he gives "comyng." This is the real reading of the MS., and puts us right. In the second case, he misses the insertion of "wonder," and prints it, by error, in Roman type. In the other two cases, he prints the corrected readings in italics, according to his system. He has thus succeeded in his endeavour in three instances out of four; but even thus we could not have hence discovered that the word for which he has substituted "to" is the MS. "togeder"; and that for which he has substituted "for ire" is the MS. "frothe."

But for the student who is minutely inquisitive, a much more subtle trap remains behind. It is the aim of editors to make lines scan; and when the lines will not scan some violence has to be used. I will just point out one example, occurring in the very passage which I have considered above. In the Knight's Tale, as above, l. 798 (A. 1656), we find this line:

"In his fighting were a wood lyoun."

I strongly suspect it is correct as it stands, and that the emphasis fell upon the initial "In." Be this as it may, the editors will not have it so. First of all came Tyrwhitt, and inserted the word "as." We then get:

"In his fighting were as a wood lyoun."

Mr. Wright seizes upon this "as," and inserts it. Then comes Mr. Jephson, and copies him. Then Dr. Morris, having the word before his eyes in all the editions, and being, doubtless, familiar with this form of the line, misses the fact of its being an insertion, and prints the "as" in Roman type. And Mr. Gilman adopts the same reading.

Meanwhile, whence did this "as" come? It is not in the Six-text. It is not in the Harleian MS. I look in the only black-letter edition I possess (that of 1561), and it is not there either. How, I ask, is this? And I pause for a reply.

I will simply add my conviction that Chaucer's lines have been mercilessly tinkered in many places, and that words have been inserted to make the lines scan, simply because the editors have resolved that they shall scan in that particular way which they have preconceived as being the right one. From such texts critics have deduced the result that Chaucer's lines do scan in that particular way; which is merely arguing in a vicious circle. We shall yet have to face the facts.

FIRDUSI AND THE OLD HIGH-GERMAN LAY OF HILDEBRAND.

Oxford: April 5, 1890.

As Grein in his critical edition of the Hildebrandlied (Göttingen, 1858) first pointed out, there is a striking parallel between the subject of this fragmentary epic and the well-known episode in Firdusi, recording a similar unconscious and fatal contest between Rustem and Sorab. Since the summary of this episode given by Grein (pp. 40-42) does not clear up the real cause which led to the catastrophe, I venture to touch upon this point as a matter not without interest to the student of Aryan folk-song.

According to F. von Schack's Heldensagen des Firdusi, Sorab, the heroic son, was fated to be slain, without knowledge, by his own father, because his mother was not of the same Iranian stock, but belonged to a Turanian family. F. von Schack's conclusive argument deserves to be quoted from the introduction to his Heldensagen des Firdusi (Stuttgart, 1877), Band i., p. 90:

"Als die Frucht verbotener Liebe zu einem Weibe aus Turanischem Geschlecht ward Rustem's Sohn Sorab vom Verhängnis auserschen, um das Mark seines Lebens zu zerstören. Vater und Sohn sollen sich unerkannt im Kampfe gegenüber treten, jener soll diesen töten und sich am Schmerz über den gemordeten Liebling verbluten."

Unless I am mistaken, the same subject preserved to us by Firdusi and the Lay of Hildebrand is also met with in an early Russian or Serbian song, concerning which Mr. W. R. Morfill may be able to enlighten us.

Lastly, let me mention the well-known classical legend of Oedipus, foredoomed by an oracle to slay his father Laios, and to enter into an incestuous union with his own mother, Jokasta, the underlying clue to which has always puzzled the sagacity of scholars. May we not see in this mythus the outgrowth of some real facts and prehistorical events analogous to Firdusi's old Iranian tradition—viz., the extirpation of the Pelasgi by the later colonists, and the subsequent amalgamation of the Hellenic race with the subjugated aborigines?

In support of such a view, I can at least refer to an authority like Alfred Maury, who remarks on the mythus of Oedipus:

"qu'il doit être rangé parmi ces légendes qui semblent tirer leur origine de faits historiques, dénaturés et embellis par l'imagination populaire" (Histoire des Religions de la Grèce Antique, 1857-59, tom. 1^{re}, p. 307).

CHAUCER'S STORY OF "THE MAD COW."

Glasgow: April 15, 1890.

Those who are interested in the comparative study of popular tales, as well as all Chaucer students, must be very grateful to Prof. Skeat for having explained the allusion to the "mad cow" in the Wife of Bath's Prologue (ACADEMY, April 5, p. 239)—that it refers to some version of the wide-spread story of the Husband and his Parrot, in which a chough, or jackdaw, took the place of the "green mantled pratler," and was represented by the frail wife as being "wood," or mad, instead of being a deliberate slanderer. But I think he is mistaken in saying that Chaucer "used some of the details" of that story in his Manciple's Tale.

In Part V. of Originals and Analogues of some of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales," under the heading of "The Tell-tale Bird" (p. 439 ff.), I have cited all the known versions and variants (the Jātaka version, referred to by Prof. Rhys Davids, ACADEMY, April 12, p. 255, was then unknown to me) of the story of the Husband and the Parrot, from which it will be seen that the Manciple's Tale of Phoebus and the Crow, as also Gower's story in his Confessio Amantis, was taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses, and that, while the Latin story is analogous to the Eastern versions of the Husband and the Parrot, and the mediæval European story of the Husband and the Magpie, they differ in the conclusion very considerably from each other. The oldest known European form of the Parrot or Magpie story is found in a French metrical version of the History of the Seven Wise Masters (Li Romans des Sept Sages), of the thirteenth century, which is given in full, with side-notes, in my paper on "The Tell-tal Bird," above referred to. And it is highly probable that Chaucer was familiar with that work, from which our oldest English metrical version of "The Seven Sages" was derived, which indeed may also have been known to the poet, though he seems to refer to some form of the story differing slightly from that found in the "Seven Wise Masters."

SOME BOOKS ON ECONOMICS.

London: April 14, 1890.

In the brief notice of our work, The Physiology of Industry, contained in the last number of the ACADEMY, the reviewer, professing to give the gist of our argument, says: "Messrs. Mummery and Hobson maintain the antithetical paradox that 'saving does not reduce the aggregate consumed.'"

Now this paradox is not ours, but that of Mill and his followers; and, so far from maintaining it, it is the chief object of our work to disprove it. This we distinctly assert on p. 7 in our preface.

A. F. MUMMERY.

J. A. HOBSON.

[Mr. Henry Dunning Macleod also writes a long letter of protest against the notice of his book on The Theory of Credit in the same number of the ACADEMY. He wishes to point out that his paradox, "credit is capital," is derived from Demosthenes; and that, whatever Cournot may have written, other French economists have spoken well of his books.]

THE STONE-AGE IN FRANCE.

La France préhistorique d'après les Sépultures et les Monuments. Par Emile Cartailhac. (Paris: Félix Alcan.)

PREHISTORIC France was last year prominently before the world. The visitor to the Champ de Mars was brought face to face with primitive man in novel, striking, and realistic fashion. It was not simply that he looked into a glass-case and saw there, neatly mounted and labelled, the stone axe or the sculptured bone or the bronze celt—such relics are familiar enough nowadays in most museums; but at the Exhibition he found himself in the presence of life-like models of men and women as they lived and worked in prehistoric days. Here was a group of savage folk, busily engaged in chipping stone implements; there another, engraving the bones and antlers of the reindeer; and yonder a third, occupied in casting the metal axe-head. And not only was prehistoric man thus resurrectionised, but the archaeologist and the architect, putting their heads together, reconstructed his primitive dwellings. M. Garnier appropriately started his famous Street of Habitations with the rude rock-shelter, the limestone cave, the skin tent, and the lake-dwellings of prehistoric man.

While this magnificent object-lesson appealed to the millions who thronged the exhibition, the meeting of the International Congress of Prehistoric Archaeology attracted to Paris the leading specialists from all parts of the world. It was during the sitting of this Congress that M. Cartailhac, who had taken a prominent part in the arrangement of the archaeological section of the exhibition, announced the publication of the volume now under review. It is a volume for which his friends had long been waiting; for years had passed since he first promised it as a contribution to the "Bibliothèque Scientifique Internationale."

Going back to the beginning of man's existence in that part of the world now called France, M. Cartailhac—though essentially an archaeologist—is bound to touch upon geology. As a matter of course, he introduces Prof. de Mortillet's system of classification—a curiously mixed system, in which archaeological periods and geological epochs are so mingled as to give the scheme a piebald complexion not altogether satisfactory. M. Cartailhac evidently feels that it is not exactly after his own heart; for whereas the professor makes a bold start in miocene time with his so-called eolithic or pre-palaeolithic stage of humanity, our author is himself a man of much more moderate views. And so, with grave doubts about the existence of such a being as eolithic man, he presents us with a tabular scheme in which no place is found for the miocene period; while, even with regard to pliocene time, he writes: "Aucune trace certaine de l'homme en Europe." Written by either an English or a German anthropologist, such an admission would occasion no surprise; but it is rare to find one of the French school expressing himself with such reserve. Not only are the flints of Thenay and Puy Courty thus gently set aside, but the bones of Saint Prest, like the Italian discoveries at Monte Aperto and Castenedola, are once more laid to rest.

But if tertiary man, or his hypothetical anthropoid predecessor, is no longer in evidence, at what period—we may ask—does the French archaeologist believe that man first made his appearance in his part of the world? So far as is at present known, it appears that man steps upon the French stage, the contemporary of Elephas antiquus and Rhinoceros Merckii, at that archaeological epoch which Mortillet has termed Chellénne—a period so named from Chelles, in the Department of Seine-et-Oise, where worked flints have been found in deposits believed to be of inter-glacial age.

Leaving this question as provisionally settled, M. Cartailhac takes his reader by the hand and introduces him successively to the early river-drift men, to the cave-dwellers of the reindeer-period, and to their successors of neolithic times. But here he stops; and the men of the metal-ages are kept out of view in the present volume. So far, however, as relates to the stone-using folk, the author gives an excellent account of what we know concerning their industrial arts and their ways of living, as revealed by the study of the relics so abundantly scattered throughout France. By ransacking their sepulchral caves and megalithic crypts we have gained a full acquaintance with the burial rites of some of these ancient peoples, while the garniture of the tomb has also thrown much light upon their daily life.

Knowing so much about the weapons, tools, and ornaments of these stone-users, we naturally want to learn something about the men themselves. What were their physical characters? What their ethnical relations? These questions, however, are not readily answered, for the skeletons of the men of the stone-ages are provokingly few and ill-preserved. Human palaeontology makes but a poor show in any of our museums, and for this defect the explorers themselves are not altogether free from blame. M. Cartailhac—who, being an archaeological anthropologist, can speak with freedom to his fellow-workers—does not hesitate to say: "Les archéologues ont détruit, à eux seuls, plus d'ossements que les agents naturels et que les ouvriers des champs."

So far as our own country is concerned, a similar charge is unfortunately too true; but there is reason to hope for better things in the near future. At the instance of General Pitt Rivers a Committee of Aid to Explorers has been recently appointed by the Anthropological Institute; and one of its prime functions will be that of instructing the archaeologist—whether dealing with historic or prehistoric sites—in the most approved modes of preserving, measuring, and describing the various organic remains which he may happen to unearth.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW JAINA INSCRIPTIONS FROM MATHURĀ.

Vienna: April 5, 1890.

A letter from Dr. A. Führer, dated Mathurā, March 11, 1890, informs me that a liberal grant by the government of the North-West Provinces has enabled him to resume the excavation of the Svetāmbara temple under the Kankālī Tilā, and that the results of the working season of 1890 considerably surpass those of 1889.

In a little more than two months Dr. Führer obtained a large number of inscriptions, seventeen of which, according to the impressions accompanying his letter, undoubtedly belong to the Indo-Scythic period, and furnish most important information regarding the history of the Jaina sect. He, moreover, discovered to the east of the Svetāmbara temple a brick Stūpa, and to the west another large Jaina temple which in his opinion belonged to the Digambara sect. The excavations on these sites yielded 60 images, 120 railing pillars and bars, as well as a considerable number of Toranas and other architectural pieces, all of which are adorned by exquisite sculptures. He was thus enabled to forward to the museum at Lucknow about a ton and a quarter of archaeological specimens.

Dr. Führer will, in due time, himself describe his archaeological treasures, and make them known by illustrations. But the inscriptions which he has kindly placed at my disposal are, I think, well worthy of immediate notice. They all belong to the class of short donative inscriptions, found on pillars, images, Toranas, and other sculptures, and closely resemble those discovered at Mathurā in former years by Sir A. Cunningham, Dr. Burgess, Mr. Growse, and Dr. Führer himself. Their dates range between the year 5 of Devaputra Kanishka and the year 86 of the Indo-Scythic era, or assuming the latter to be identical with the Saka era, between A.D. 83 and A.D. 164. The name of the second Indo-Scythic king Huvishka occurs twice. It is both times misspelt, being given in the one case as "Huvashka," and in the other as "Huviksha." Huvishka's dates are the years 40 and 44.

Eleven inscriptions give names of various subdivisions of the Jaina monks mentioned in the Kalpasūtra. The already known Vārana gana, or school, erroneously called Chārana in the Kalpasūtra, is, or rather was, named (in one case it is mutilated) three times. Among its kulas or families, the Aryya-Chetiya or Aryya-Chetikiya occurs twice, and the Paśyamitriya once. Both names turn up here for the first time in epigraphic documents. They evidently correspond with the Ajja-Chedaya (in Sanskrit Arya-Chetaka) and the Pāsamittija (in Sanskrit Paśyamitriya) kulas of the Kalpasūtra. With the former kula are associated two sākhās or branches, the Vajjanāgarī and the Haritamālāgadhī. The first is clearly identical with the Vajjanāgarī sākhā of the Kalpasūtra, and the second must be its Hārītāmālāgarī sākhā. The latter name is certainly corrupt, and probably a mistake for Haritamālāgadhī, from which the form of the inscription differs only by the not unusual Prakritic substitution of the surd ka for the sibilant ga. Most of the names of the Sākhās are derived from towns. If the proposed restoration is accepted, the name of this Sākhā will mean "that of the fortress (gadha) of Haritamāla—i.e., literally of the field or site of Harita." Much more frequent in the new inscriptions is the name of the Kotiya or Kottikiya gana, which, as I have shown in my former articles, corresponds with the Kotika or Kodya gana of the Jaina tradition. It occurs eleven times, and is thrice combined with the well-known names of the Stāniya, Stāniktiya, or Thāniya kula (the Vānija of the Kalpasūtra) and of the Vairī or Vairā sākhā. In four inscriptions it is connected with two new names, that of the Brahmadāsika kula and that of the Uchchānāgarī or Uchchānāgarī sākhā. The name Uchchānāgarī stands, in the Kalpasūtra, first in the list of the Sākhās of the Kotika gana. But there is no exact equivalent for Brahmadāsika. The Kalpasūtra, however, mentions, in connexion with the Kotika gana, a Bambhalijja kula (for which the commentators give the impossible Sanskrit substitute Brahmaliptaka), and this Prakrit form can be shown to be a correct shortening of the longer name of the inscriptions. It is a general rule in the Indian languages that so-called "Kosenamen," or names of endearment, may be formed from compared names by adding to their first part an affix like ka, la, or ila, which serves to form diminutives, and by omitting the second part. Thus we have Devaka, Devala, and Devila for Devadatta or Devagupta, Styaka for Simhabhata, and Vīśala for Vīśvamalla. According to this principle, Brahmadāsika may become Brahmala, and its possessive adjective will be Brahmalīya, which latter is the regular Sanskrit representative of the Prakrit Bambhalijja. With this explanation the identity of the Brahmadāsika and the Bambhalijja kulas may be accepted without hesitation. I will add that the names Brahmadāsika and Uchchānāgarī also occur, the latter with a slight difference in spelling, in Sir A. Cunningham's Mathurā inscription No. 2 of the year 5 (Archæological Survey Reports, vol. iii., plate 13). The correct reading of the second (recte the first) side is [Ku]lāto Brahmadāsikāto Uchchānāgarīto [sākhāto]. The la is slightly disfigured on the facsimile, and instead of the last word we have ubhanāgarīto, which gives no meaning, and has led to a curious misconception regarding the purport of the document. The inscriptions mention also distinctly two sambhogas, or "district communities," the S'rika and the S'riguha, or, as perhaps it must be read, S'rigriha, which are both known from the inscriptions noticed formerly. In one case there is a mutilated name which looks like sārta sambho[ga]. If we omit the latter, the new inscriptions prove the correctness of the Jaina tradition with respect to the early existence of six divisions of monks, not traced before, and they confirm some of the results obtained in former years.

In addition, they settle another very important question. According to the Svetāmbara scriptures, women are allowed to become ascetics. But we have hitherto had no proof that this doctrine was really ancient. Dr. Führer's new finds leave no doubt that it was. Most of the Mathurā inscriptions mention in the preamble the name of the donor's spiritual director, at whose request (nirvartana) the donation was made. Usually this person is characterised as an ascetic by the titles ganin or vāchaka, or by the epithet aryya, "the venerable." The inscriptions found in former years show in this position invariably male names. Most of the new documents resemble them in this respect. But some mention females—e.g., Aryya-Sāgamikā, "the venerable Sāgamikā"; Aryya-Sāma, "the venerable Syāma"; and Aryya-Vasulā, "the venerable Vasulā"; as the persons at whose request the images or other sculptures were dedicated. The position in which these female names occur, as well as the epithet aryya, proves that we have to deal with Jaina nuns who were active in the interest of their faith. This discovery makes it very probable that the Jainas, as the Svetāmbara tradition asserts, from the first allowed women to enter on the road to salvation, and that the suggestion of some orientalists, according to which the Svetāmbaras copied the Buddhists in this practice, must be rejected as erroneous.

A closer examination of Dr. Führer's new inscriptions may possibly reveal other points of interest. But what I have been able to bring forward on a first inspection certainly justifies the assertion that they really are most valuable, and that Dr. Führer has again laid the students of the history of the religions of India under deep obligation.

I may add that, in my opinion, more may be yet expected from the Kankālī Tilā. For the large temples which Dr. Führer has discovered must, I think, have contained longer inscriptions, recording the dates when, and the circumstances under which, they were built. I trust that the government of the North-West Provinces will enable Dr. Führer to resume his operations next year, and to institute a careful search for these documents. Should the exploration of the Kankālī Tilā, however, be complete, then the Chaubārā mound ought to be attacked, because it undoubtedly hides the ruins of an ancient Vaishnava temple, and will yield documents elucidating the history of the hitherto much underrated Bhāgavatas—a sect which is older than the Buddhists, and even than the Jainas.

SCIENCE NOTES.

It is feared that M. Jacques Bertillon will be prevented by illness in his family from attending the meeting of the Anthropological Institute next Tuesday. Possibly his brother, M. Alphonse Bertillon, will come over from Paris and take his place. But in the event of neither being able to attend, the system of anthropometry identified with their names will be explained by Dr. F. J. Mouat. It is an ingenious system, of great value in the identification of criminals, and when demonstrated at one of the Congresses held last autumn in Paris made a great impression on the audience. Probably Mr. Francis Galton, who is familiar with the method, will speak on the subject at next Tuesday's meeting.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

At the meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society on Monday next, April 21, at 4 p.m., Sir M. Monier-Williams will read a paper on "The Transliteration of Indian Languages," with a view to some formal action being taken to promote greater uniformity in transliteration more especially of proper names.

THE Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund for April contains a valuable paper of details on the Syriac dialect spoken in the village of Ma'lula in the Antilibanus, which the writer (Mr. F. J. Bliss, of Beirut) represents as "a certain strange survival of the Aramaic which Christ spoke not 150 miles away." The cave-dwellings and rock-tombs are also of much interest. Mr. Bliss spent a few days at Ma'lula in June 1889. He transliterates the Syriac words into Latin characters. We notice that there is no trace of the n preformative in the third masculine; it occurs, instead, in the first singular and plural. The y preformative occurs in the third singular and plural.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKSPERE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, March 22.)

JOHN TAYLOR, Esq., in the chair.—Mrs. Meyrick Heath read some notes on "Lear," a play which seems the climax of the third period of Shakspeare's life, the one in which he gives vent to the pent-up passionate protest against the injustice of life, the ingratitude and falsity of those near and dear—all the bitterness and gall of outraged love and unexampled treachery. Single notes of the theme had been struck before, but in the wild storm of crime and misery portrayed in this play all the venom and passion stored in his heart is seen at once. The earlier plays of this period lead up to this supreme tragedy; those after begin to soften, as if his fury had expended itself. "Lear" is the darkest hour of night which comes before the dawn. Hazlitt said that the contemplation of this play forced him to the conclusion that the language of poetry is superior to that of painting. This is true, for the infinite power of suggestion of character which a dramatist like Shakspeare possesses cannot be reached by the best of painters. And the character of Lear abounds in suggested traits. Many of these occur in the first act, which shows him to be no stainless saint. The fire of suffering is needed to purge this dross; but still the punishment which tears the old man's soul in twain is too terrible, and at the last he gets all our sympathies. For pure beauty and deep feeling the end of this play is unsurpassed by anything Shakspeare wrote. Certainly no painter could have shown us the mixture of weakness and strength which the poet's art presents to us.—Mr. John Taylor read "A General view of 'Lear'" saying that the king, who is full of ungenerous faults, should be blamed rather than pitied. He gave up his kingdom when he was old and tired of it. His elder daughters would of course scorn the judgment of one who had so brutally cast off their sister and passionately banished his steadfast courtier. Goneril is not to be blamed for taking the part of her steward who had without sufficient cause been degradingly struck by Lear. The fool is the one wise man of the play, and Lear's tolerance of his satire is the one mark of wisdom in himself. However much Goneril may have forfeited any claim to respect, a father who could be so pitilessly resentful even towards a bad daughter can hardly be an object for compassion himself. The way in which Kent behaves towards the unfortunate Oswald is but one instance to show that Shakspeare was an earlier Carlyle in siding with the aristocratic and strong against the weak of the earth, and well deserved the treatment of the stocks. Worthless as Goneril and Regan proved themselves to be, it is rather as sisters and wives than as daughters that we condemn them. Without retaliation they submitted to their father's rage, which all turned upon the dismissal of his attendants. With Lear there is no forgiveness, but, contrariwise, cursing; and his passions are all of the earth, earthy. How different in sublimation of soul and self-effacement from a Francis Assisi or a Xavier. Compassion for him concentrates in his exposure to the storm. He might have avoided this by going to Regan; but only at the expense of his dignity and self-respect. Thus he is more majestic in ruin than in prime.—Mr. R. H. Warren read a paper on "Gloucester and his Sons," showing, in detail, how Shakspeare leads them through their several experiences to the same conclusion in which they acknowledge the justice of divine retribution.—Miss Florence Herspath read a paper on "Cordelia," who, if she is one of the most perfect of Shakspeare's creations from a literary point of view, has little claim to any moral pre-eminence. Her virtues only appear great when contrasted with the vices of her sisters. At first we find her irresolute and cold, wanting in sympathy for her father's weaknesses. Towards her sisters and Burgundy she displays a fair share of the family spirit. No daughter possessed of common humanity could have done less than she did in helping to re-instate her father in his rights, and it is not till they actually meet again that she shows any evidence of sympathetic tenderness. The admiration generally felt for Cordelia is due more to her tragic death than to her intrinsic merits.—Mr. Meyrick Heath read a paper on "'Lear' as an Acting Play," in which, taking exception to Charles Lamb's statement that the "Lear" of Shakspeare cannot be acted, he said that never was there a more unjust assertion, or one which would have been more indignantly resented by the dramatist himself. A character that cannot be acted must either be an impossible or superhuman one, or be so ill drawn as to defy the study and genius of the artist; and Lear is intensely human in his weakness and in his impetuosity. It is only when the character is represented by a trained actor accustomed to the study of every phase of human nature that its beauty can be fully appreciated. The play was written to be acted, and many minor points are completely lost in the mere reading.—Mr. L. M. Griffiths read a paper on "Some Various Readings in 'Lear,'" calling attention to the quartos, and referring to some incidents in the life of their publisher, Nathaniel Butler, one of the pioneers of newspaper literature. In this capacity, allusion is made to him by Ben Jonson in "The Staple of News" (i. 2), and by Fletcher in "The Fair Maid of the Inn" (iv. 2).

LIVERPOOL LITERARY AND PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.—
(Monday, March 31)

THE REV. H. H. HIGGINS, president, in the chair.—
MR. R. J. LLOYD read a paper on the "Physical Nature of Vowel Sounds," giving an epitome of doctrines advanced by the writer in papers contributed to the current volume of the Phonetische Studien. After a brief criticism of existing vowel theories, the following propositions were put forward as the basis of a proposed new theory. The quality of any vowel is determined by the characteristic resonance of its configuration. In the speaking voice this resonance is crossed by a powerful glottal tone; in the whispering voice it is accompanied only by feeble miscellaneous noises. It is in whispered vowels, therefore, that the vowel resonances are best studied. It is equally futile to study configuration apart from resonance, or resonance apart from configuration. A marked parallelism is to be noted between them. There are indeed some vowels wherein the voice tunnel remains comparatively open and tube-like; but in most cases it is markedly differentiated into an outer and an inner portion, which may be called the "porch" and the "chamber." All the chief vowels have configurations of this type, and possess a double resonance, answering to the doubleness of their configuration. The upper element of the resonance is always the proper note of the "porch," while the lower element is that of the whole configuration. The character of the resulting vowel is determined by the relative pitch of these two resonances one to the other. This relation of pitch may be approximately determined for each vowel by calculation, from the observed dimensions of human configurations, or still better from the behaviour of experimental configurations framed to yield double resonances having any desired relation of pitch or ratio of frequency. The result had been to convince the writer that the most impressive and cognizable of such mixtures of resonance are chiefly those in which the ratio of frequency between the two component tones is expressed by a prime whole number. He associated the close e vowel with the ratio 2; the open e with 3; the o basis of a with 5; the a basis of e with 7; the open e with 11 (mid-front-wide?), and 13 (low-front-narrow?); the close e with 17 (French le), and 19 (French été); the u class, less certainly, with 23; the wide i with 29 or 31; the narrow i with 37; and consonantal y with 41 and 43. Theoretical reasons were given in corroboration of this doctrine, and minor differences discussed. The essayist concluded by indulging the anticipation that the sounds of all vowels would eventually be found to admit of exact arithmetical expression, just like those of music.—An interesting discussion followed, in which the president, Principal Rendall, Mr. W. S. Logeman, Mr. Malcolm Guthrie, Mr. R. McLintock, and the reader of the paper took part.

FINE ART.

SOME NUMISMATIC PUBLICATIONS.

NOT numismatists alone but all students of classical archaeology will be stirred by the news that Photiades Pasha has resolved to sell his collection of Greek and Byzantine coins. Himself, we believe, a native of Crete, he has used his exceptional opportunities during the past thirty years—as minister at Athens, governor of Crete, and ambassador at Rome—to form a cabinet which is probably unrivalled among private owners, and which contains many pieces unknown to the leading museums of Europe. Preliminary to the sale, he has had a catalogue prepared by M. W. Froehner, formerly of the Louvre, who acknowledges help in doubtful identifications from M. Imhoof-Blumer. Apart from its interest as a permanent record of the collection about to be dispersed, the catalogue is enriched with ten plates, containing reproductions of some of the rarest pieces in phototypy—a process which is less successful than that of the Autotype Company adopted by the British Museum. It is divided into two parts, one dealing with the Greek coins, the other with the Byzantine. The former series numbers 1530 lots; and it is to be noted that they are confined to Greece proper (including the islands), thus omitting not only Sicily and Magna Graecia, but also Asia, Africa, and the Euxine. While all are well represented, perhaps Thessaly, Epirus, Elis, and Crete show the largest number of unique or inedited specimens. The Byzantine series numbers 682 lots, ranging through ten centuries from Arcadius to the last of the Palaeologi. Though it contains a still larger proportion of rare pieces than the Greek series, it must be confessed that the interest is rather historical than artistic. The sale will take place at the Hôtel Drouot, beginning on May 19; and catalogues may be obtained from M. H. Hoffmann, 11, Rue Benouville, Paris.

THE Indian Antiquary for November (London: Trübner)—which has only just been received in this country—opens with a long paper of twenty quarto pages, by Capt. R. U. Temple, upon "The Coins of the Modern Native Chiefs of the Punjab." It is illustrated with an excellent coloured map; but, unfortunately, the two plates of reproductions have been reserved for a later issue. This paper is of special importance, because of the little attention paid by numismatists to the modern currencies of native India. It is based upon the collection in the British Museum, by far the larger portion of which was presented by Capt. Temple himself. Besides its value as an accurate description of a rather complicated series, which only local knowledge could disentangle, it possesses a general interest as affording a good example of Oriental conservatism. On this point we venture to differ somewhat from the conclusion drawn by Capt. Temple, who refers to the theory of evolution of coins expounded by Dr. Evans and Mr. Keary. That theory, however, relates to persistence of type, maintained (even when the meaning of the type is lost) in spite of continuous modifications and other debasements. Whereas the facts brought forward by Capt. Temple show that the currency of the minor chiefs in the Punjab has remained absolutely unchanged in type, in legend, and even in date, for a period of 140 years. A familiar example of the same principle is the nineteenth year of Shah Alam, which was impressed for a long series of years after 1773 (the true date) upon the so-called "sonant" rupees issued by the East India Company. It is curious to learn that George Thomas, the well-known Irish adventurer of the end of the last century, is reported to have set up a mint of his own, though none of his coins can now be found.

"YOUNG COLLECTOR SERIES."—Coins and Tokens of the English Colonies. By Daniel F. Howarth. With an Introductory Chapter by Samuel Smith. (Sonnenschein.) This is by no means the least excellent volume of an admirable series, in which authorities of acknowledged rank have condescended to give advice to "young collectors." As no term is more ambiguous than "colonies," it may be as well to state at once that the author has included—and rightly—not only the North American States in their colonial days, but the English coinage in India, and also the peculiar currencies of Man, Guernsey, and Jersey—in fact, all dependencies of the British Crown. Excepting the mohurs and pagodas of India—which themselves have ceased to be current—and the well-known Melbourne and Sydney sovereigns, no colony either has or ever had a gold coinage of its own. But what is lacking in intrinsic value is made up in historic interest by the quaint issues of the older colonies, and by the countless series of tokens which continued well into the present century. Such a step-mother has England been to her colonies in the matter of coinage that at the present day she supplies them all (again excepting India) with their silver and copper; and it must be admitted that these modern series, from the Mint and from Birmingham, present little variety or attractiveness. It is only in postage stamps that the colonies are allowed to exercise any originality. This handbook, it should be added, is abundantly illustrated with woodcuts, which is certainly the most useful mode of illustration for the "young collector."

British War Medals and Decorations issued to the British Military and Naval Forces from 1588 to 1889. By D. Hastings Irwin (Upcott Gill). The growing taste for collecting war medals is evidenced by this popular book, which continues Gibson's standard work (2 vols., 1880) down to the present time. It is illustrated with ten plates, which give fac-similes reproduced by some rather poor photographic process. Those who are acquainted only with the medals awarded for familiar campaigns will be astonished to find here the long catalogue of those struck at the end of last century and the beginning of this by particular regiments, both of the line and of volunteers. The author has found it impossible to draw the line between war medals proper and medals given for other meritorious service; and he has erred, if at all, on the side of liberal inclusion. His labours seem to be both accurate and exhaustive. However, when mentioning the Royal Guelphic Order, he should have explained the initials "K. H.," and he ought not to have said that it was "discontinued when Hanover ceased to be under the government of this country." As regards medals granted by the East India Company, we believe we are correct in saying that examples in gold were struck for the chairman for the time being, and in silver gilt for each of the directors. Finally, two words of counsel may be given to collectors of war medals: (1) that they should never commit the offence of tempting the original recipients to sell them; and (2) that they must themselves be on their guard against counterfeits of the Victoria Cross.

We may also mention that Messrs. Groombridge & Sons are now issuing in parts a new edition of the late Thomas Carter's British War Medals, and How they were Won. This, indeed, is rather a military history on special lines than a guide for collectors; but it deserves a word of praise in this place for the excellence of the coloured illustrations with which it is accompanied.

LETTER FROM EGYPT.

Cairo: April 4, 1890.

ON the eastern bank of the Nile, a little to the north of Minieh, is a waddi, the entrance to which is filled with the debris of brick buildings, pottery, human bones, and fragments of mummy cloth. In Murray's Handbook, the remains are said to be those of "an old town"; but they really mark the site of the ancient necropolis of Minieh, where the tombs, built of brick, have been piled one upon another after the fashion of the Kôm es-Sultân at Abydos. In the middle ages a few houses were erected on the summit of the Kôm el-Kafara, as it is called, and a brick wall was built on the eastern side of the waddi to protect the place from Beduin invasions. On the cliff, a little to the south of it, I discovered, four years ago, the cartouches of Ramses III., and a full-length portrait of the king in front of the crocodile-headed god Sebek (see ACADEMY, May 1, 1886). The sculpture was subsequently re-discovered and described by Mr. Lawrence Oliphant. This year I found the quarries in memory of which the sculpture was executed. They lie behind the cliff, and have fallen in, in consequence partly of the pooriness of the stone, partly of the manner in which they were cut. A few yards to the north of the ravine in which the Kôm is situated, and a short distance from a well, I came across several tombs out in the rock. The largest and most perfect consisted of a corridor leading into a large oblong chamber, in which a niche has been cut facing the door to receive the image of the original occupant. On the right-hand side of the entrance, within the central chamber, the figures of the deceased and his wife have been carved out of the rock, larger than life-size, and on either side of what seems to have been the image of a god. Beyond them is the pit or "well" in which the mummy was placed, and above it is a so-called "false-door" of the same form as those in the Gizeh tombs of the IVth Dynasty. The figures, however, like the similar figures in the tombs of Assûn and Nezlet Basineh, refer us to the age of the XIIth or XIIIth Dynasty. The walls of the tomb were once covered with painted stucco, which has long since disappeared.

Some three-quarters of a mile to the north of the Kôm el-Kafara is another waddi, the name of which I was unable to learn. At the northern angle of this I found the remains of a house of the Roman period (as shown by the pottery surrounding it), the foundations of which had been cut out of the rock. One of the rooms, with its door and three niches which served as cupboards, had been almost entirely hewn out of the stone. The most curious part of the building, however, was a wine-press, which, together with a vat of large size and the pipes through which the juice of the grape ran, was carved out of the solid cliff. The press had been lined with cement, and the places in which the levers of the press rested are still visible. It is the first thing of the kind I have ever seen in Egypt.

A most interesting and important discovery has been made by some natives this winter in the neighbourhood of Deyrût, the Phylakê Thebaikê of ancient geography—a discovery, however, which unfortunately will prove almost sterile to science, in consequence of the present disastrous law in regard to the sale and exportation of antiquities. A tomb has been found containing two mummies, which now, alas! have been torn to fragments. One of the mummies was that of a female, with a white-skinned Greek face of wonderfully artistic workmanship, and evidently a portrait, a wreath of flowers surrounding the head. The other mummy, which was that of the husband, was, when found, covered entirely with gold-leaf. On the breast was a large figure of Anubis, clad in a gilded leopard's skin and supporting an orb of gold, as well as a tablet painted red, on which is written in embossed letters of gold, $\text{CAPAIOYC CAPAIONOC LIA ATEKNOC}$, "Sarapus, the son of Sarapiôn (who died), the year 14, childless." The other inscriptions on the mummies were in hieroglyphs. Among the objects discovered in the tomb were terra-cotta figures of Harpokrates and other personages of an unusually artistic character, and a number of Greek papyri, including some lines of the Iliad. Unhappily, the papyri, like the mummies, have been torn and scattered, and we shall never know what all the contents of the tomb exactly were. It is time that the scientific world should raise its voice in protest against a system which induces the fellahin—the only persons in Egypt likely to make discoveries of important monuments—to conceal and mutilate what they find. The Egyptian Government cannot refuse to listen to such a protest, and classical scholars must remember that they will probably suffer quite as much as the Egyptologists from the maintenance of the existing law. The value of an ancient monument consists in its usefulness to science; and, so long as science can discover all it can tell us, it matters little into whose hands it eventually goes.

Some of the ostraka which I have obtained this year from Karnak have revealed a fact which will be interesting to the Jewish community. I find that in the time of Ptolemy Physkon, one of the tax collectors at Diospolis, or Thebes, was a Jew named Simon, the son of Eleazar ($\Sigma\mu\omega\nu \epsilon\lambda\epsilon\alpha\zeta\alpha\rho$). In spite of the office he held, however, he was unable to write Greek, one of the ostraka informing us that it was a duplicate written by his son Dellous, "at the wish of Simôn, as he cannot write himself." Possibly Simon's original copy was in Hebrew or Aramaic. This was in the twenty-eighth year of Ptolemy Physkon (B.C. 142). In the preceding year he had received a letter from his fellow tax-collector Marius—whose Latin name is noticeable—acknowledging the receipt of 3440 copper drachmae, "the customary tax paid to the Theban Zeus" ($\tau\omicron\upsilon \nu\epsilon\pi\iota \Theta\eta\beta\alpha\varsigma \Delta\iota\omicron\varsigma$). Simon evidently had Hellenistic tendencies, and his son and successor in his office bore the Greek name of Philoklês. The latter tells us that in "the third year" he paid one hundred ardebs of wheat into the treasury on account of "the district around Thebes," and in "the fifth year" one hundred and fifty-three ardebs of barley.

Want of time has prevented me from carrying out my intention of stopping at Tel-el-Amarna, and visiting the now rifled tomb of Khu-n-Aten. For the benefit of other travellers, I may say that, according to the information I have received, the tomb lies in the cliffs due east of the village of Tel-el-Amarna. The natives of the village discovered and despoiled it, so that any one of them could act as guide. The inscriptions on its walls are, I fear, hopelessly ruined before it has been possible to copy them. It is probable that they were the first victims of the Tel-el-Amarna fellahin and the Ekhnaton dealers, who have defaced the tombs of Beni Hassan and El-Bersheh. The perpetrators of the outrage still remain unpunished, so that we may expect more tombs to be mutilated during the coming summer.

Whatever complaints may be made about the preservation of the monuments of Upper Egypt, no words of admiration can be too strong in regard to the rapid and effective manner in which the antiquities hitherto stored away at Bulaq have been transferred to their present magnificent palace at Gizeh. The energy and good taste of the administration of the museum have been astonishing. Objects that have long been hidden away in the magazines at Bulaq for want of space can now be seen by the public and compared with other objects of the same age and character. The only drawback that I know of to the new habitation of the monuments is that the light is not always as good as it was in their old home. The faces of the scribe Ra-nofer and of the famous statue of King Khephren seem to have suffered from the change. The public, however, appear properly to appreciate the new museum and its grounds, if we may judge from the numbers of both foreigners and natives who have already flocked to them.

I have examined afresh one of the letters from Southern Palestine contained in the Tel-el-Amarna collection, in which mention is made of the cities of Keilah, Kirjath, and what I read doubtfully as Urusai. The third character of the name is injured, and I fancied that it might be intended for ru when I copied the text. My copy, however, subsequently made me think that it really was the character which had the value of sa, the name reading Urusalim, or Jerusalem. Another inspection of the tablet has shown me that my conjecture was right, and that the city of Jerusalem already existed under its familiar name in the fifteenth century B.C. It was at that time a garrison of the Egyptian king.

LONDON LECTURES ON ARCHAEOLOGY.

PROF. B. STUART POOL'S next course on Archaeology at University College will treat of the comparative aspect of the subject. There will be five lectures, beginning on April 23, and continuing on the four following Wednesdays; besides eleven visits to the British Museum, in illustration of the lectures. The lectures are a general view of the comparative method; the influence of Egypt on the nations of the Mediterranean; the later influence of Assyria; the movement of art in Assyria, Egypt, and Greece, in the seventh and six centuries B.C.; and the influence of Greece under the successors of Alexander. After the conclusion of this part of the course, Mr. Cecil Smith, of the British Museum, will treat of Greek painting and terra-cottas, in six visits to the galleries of the Museum. Special attention will be given to the primitive Phœnicians and their traces at Mycenæ; to the transition from Egyptian to Assyrian style, as shown in the bowls from Nimrud; to the character of Solomon's Temple; to the Saïte renaissance in Egypt, and the parallel movement in Assyria; to the Greek repayment, in Egypt, Persia, and India, of the debt which she owed to Asia; and, in the second part of the course, Mr. Cecil Smith will illustrate the sequence of styles in vase-painting and terra-cottas.

PROF. ROGER SMITH announces a short course of Saturday morning lectures at University College, Gower Street, on "Architecture," intended to give students of art and archaeology an outline of the history and leading features of classic and gothic architecture. The course will include visits to the British Museum and Westminster Abbey. The first lecture will take place this (Saturday) morning at eleven, and will be open to the public; subject, "Greek Architecture."

ON Monday, April 21, Mr. Talfourd Ely will deliver a public lecture in the South Kensington Museum on "The Topography of Greek Art," illustrated by the oxy-hydrogen light. This lecture is introductory to a series of four demonstrations which Mr. Talfourd Ely will afterwards give, on Thursdays at 5 p.m., in the gallery of casts from the antique. The principal subjects with which he will deal are—the beginnings of sculpture in Asia Minor, Greece, and Sicily; the temple sculptures of Aegina and Olympia; the epoch of Pheidias; and sepulchral monuments.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MESSRS. BLACKIE & SON are about to issue in folio form a new selection from the published and unpublished engravings and etchings of Turner's Liber Studiorum. Though of primary value to art students as a school of drawing on the lines laid down by Mr. Ruskin, the work will be of considerable general interest as a critical and illustrative guide to Turner's great work. It will contain ninety-two illustrations, including fifty-one facsimile reproductions of the etchings, seven of which are rare unpublished plates, and four facsimile reproductions in mezzotint by photogravure, the copper plates of which have been worked over and perfected by Mr. Frank Short. Technical and descriptive notes by Mr. Short and other writers accompany each plate; and an introductory essay, critical and historical, is contributed by Mr. Frederick Wedmore.

MR. GERALD ROBINSON has been appointed mezzotinto engraver to the Queen.

THE exhibitions to open next week are—the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours, in Pall Mall East; a collection of paintings and drawings by A. Mauve, at the Goupil Gallery, New Bond Street; and Messrs. Hollender & Cremetti's summer exhibition at the Hanover Gallery, New Bond Street.

IN connexion with the National Indian Association, Mr. C. Purdon Clarke will read a paper on "Indian Art" in the room of the Society of Arts, on Saturday next, April 26, at 4 p.m. Sir George Birdwood will take the chair.

WE quote the following Reuter's telegram, dated Athens, April 14:

"The excavations being pursued at Megalopolis in the Peloponnese, under the British School of Archaeology, have resulted in some interesting discoveries. Besides uncovering the site of a Greek theatre, the excavators have found in a tumulus a small cylindrical sarcophagus containing bones and two pieces of a gold ornament, similar to those discovered by Dr. Schliemann at Mycenæ and elsewhere. When the interior of the tumulus has been examined it is not improbable that there may be other finds."

WE notice with regret the recent death, at his residence at Brighton, of Mr. Crawford J. Pocock, known locally as a successful medical practitioner, but known perhaps more widely as among the most diligent of collectors. Mr. Crawford J. Pocock was the possessor of an important library, of a few fine examples of the etchings of Méryon, of certain English water-colours of the older school, and of such an assemblage of the engraved work of Turner as is but rarely to be beheld. Mr. Pocock had for years been likewise a Cruikshank collector, and he was quite a specialist in the matter of prints and drawings illustrative of old Brighton. It is probable that at least a portion of the treasures which Mr. Pocock had amassed, during years of unremitting inquiry and diligent purchase, will be dispersed under the hammer in London.

THE STAGE.

"A VILLAGE PRIEST."

AT the first moment of seeing it, one is not quite sure whether Mr. Grundy's new play at the Haymarket is a melodrama excused by mental analysis, or a mental analysis made popular by the methods of melodrama. But what one is quite sure about, very speedily, is that it is the work of an extremely able person. And, if it is conceivable that one did not happen to know that Mr. Sydney Grundy is, from a literary point of view, one of the only three or four really important dramatists of his period, one would see in this particular piece, at all events, incontestable proof of his capacity to unfold with most ingenious delay the various parts of an intricate story, of his ability to understand something of character and of human emotion, of his full control of the use of crisp and expressive English. "A Village Priest" is suggested by—and not at all simply translated from—"Le Secret de la Terreuse," by M. Busnach. I do not know "Le Secret de la Terreuse," but I know other work of the same adroit writer's, and I remember M. Busnach as he appears in Mme. Sarah Bernhardt's bust of him—a genius robust rather than delicate, a raconteur rather than a moralist, a Rabelais of the Café Brébant. It is not to the talent of M. Busnach, substantial and unflinching as that is, that we owe, I take it, the finest things in the new piece at the Haymarket.

The piece has five acts, and it has five strong "curtains." That is another way of saying that it abounds in those "situations" which we have lately been assured by the learned—especially by the Ibsenite learned—are almost the least necessary parts of dramatic composition. As the acts proceed, the audience, step by step, gathers knowledge as to what is the true version of certain events of which a very untrue version was set forth at the beginning; and, step by step, we may behold the dramatis personae themselves made aware of facts which we have known only a little while before them. With a story knit with curious closeness—now revealed and now withheld with singular dexterity—there is presented, not much comedy and not much of the experience of anyone whose fortunes may be felicitous and blithe, but a considerable study of human character: some of it so good that it would not be thought quite wanting in originality, even were it set forth by novelist instead of by playwright. In the latter portion of the drama the interest centres in the conflict in the mind of a village priest—Balzac's "curé de village" might almost have suggested the dramatist's character, as his Abbé Birotteau might almost have suggested the actor's impersonation—the interest centres, I say, in the conflict in this priest's mind between the vows of his office and that sense of duty which is brought home to him by present experience. Shall the virtuous suffer reproach by reason of fraud, or shall the truth be made known and the innocent saved from undeserved ignominy? Thus Mr. Grundy clearly elects to deal with what may be a difficult problem; and his solution of it is that in this case, at all events, the "seal of confession" must of necessity be broken. In the conflict itself—especially where it proceeds in the silence of the Abbé's room, in the hours of his self-examination—the dramatist has found amazingly effective material; and, in the instant of its solution, he has found an opportunity for a quietude of pathos of which Mr. Beerbohm Tree delightfully avails himself. Some measure of license must be granted to a dramatist. If no license whatever could be granted, it might be a reviewer's business to point out with severity that the Abbé Dubois would hardly in real life, entirely unaided, have come to the decision to which Mr. Grundy conducts him. Surely the discreet would have been conferred with, and authorities invited to consider a case which had no precedent. As it is, a smaller detail does call for comment. "The age of miracles is past," says the Abbé Dubois one moment before, by a happy coincidence, the moonlight illumines some guiding sentence on an inspired page. "The age of miracles is not past," he then exclaims. But the first utterance is undramatic—it is there only that it may make effective the second. That the age of miracles was past would never have occurred to the benignant simple person who was henceforth to withdraw, not from the Church's belief, but only from the ranks of its service. We are not invited to consider him a man of science; still less was he a merely flippant disciple of "the new spirit," whose cheerful denials—to quote a great bold word of Balzac's—are "as useless as an insurrection."

But, leaving many a point of real interest in the story necessarily untouched upon, I pass to the acting. It has been said already that Mr. Tree delightfully avails himself of a certain opportunity for pathetic effect. Yet nowhere, I think—not as yet even in the remarkable yet questionable close of the drama—does the actor reach quite that point of emotion which made a moment at the end of one act of the adaptation of “Froment jeune et Risler aîné” not only excellent but exquisite. On the other hand, the character here imagined by Mr. Grundy allows to Mr. Tree a variety of effect from which certain other parts of his, very cleverly and observantly though he interpreted them, inevitably shut him out—his part in “The Red Lamp,” for instance, in which, with the aid of a gait and of a make-up, he shuffled gallantly through Russian drawing-rooms. His Abbé Dubois affords him quite other opportunities for life-like portraiture of a type that is loveable; and admirably on the whole he uses them. His gesture and his facial expressions have as usual greater range than his voice. This serves him best in the pathetic, or the intentionally kindly. It serves him least well in direct and simple conversation. In that he tends to be monotonous—he is a little apt to verge upon the sing-song. Without urging the actor for one moment towards that fault of restlessness from which he is as entirely free as from the vice of rant, I am yet sure that there are passages which would gain by change, which would gain by lightness and freshness. And if, when that was accomplished, the actor could find it within his means—as I certainly believe it to be within his means—to add, elsewhere, a more poignant intensity—to vibrate here and there instead of to be purely melodious—a performance would perhaps be quite faultless, which is now admirably picturesque and sympathetic. I have the impudence, it will be seen, to ask two very different, yet not two incompatible, additions to its present virtues.

If on the whole Mr. Tree gains, Mr. Fernandez very distinctly loses by the change in the bill. From his part of the advocate in the adaptation of “Roger la Honte,” he wrung effects which the unjustly punished Jean Torquenie cannot but deny him. The one has not the opportunity for characteristic breadth in which the other was so rich. Mr. Fernandez is nevertheless continuously interesting, though there are passages between the father and his daughter which are capable, it may be, of being endowed with the expression of a more vehement affection. If that is so, to Miss Rose Norreys must be attributed some portion of whatever effect may be lacking. That order of scream with which Jeannie first recognises her parent must, I surmise, be rather baffling for Mr. Fernandez. Miss Norreys is an actress who fulfils to the uttermost the behest of Mr. Browning, that “a man’s reach should exceed his grasp.” She is ambitious, seemingly, and certainly a conscientious artist. I am glad to notice that on the whole the present performance proves her capacity to travel, not perhaps beyond the line she had hoped to be capable of attaining, but at least beyond the line within which, thus far, the public has been disposed to accept her. Mrs. Beerbohm Tree, as the daughter of the woman whose old amour with an unjust though learned judge had long been hidden, and as the unsuspecting fiancée of that judge’s son, has a part which only the born ingenue—an Evelyn Hope “of spirit, fire, and dew”—could quite satisfactorily render. But Mrs. Tree, I am sure, renders it with intelligence and with grace and discretion. No dramatist has ever dared to portray a blind man or woman whose serenity of nature was not wholly exemplary; and the blind lady whom Mr. Grundy presents as the recipient of the audience’s affection is played by Mrs. Gaston Murray with distinction and warmth. Miss Rose Leclercq, as the once erring wife, who had had the judge for a lover, has the advantage of refinement and of sympathetic presence, but scarcely perhaps reaches to the vivid expression of remorse and terror. Of the men, the only one remaining who needs mention is Mr. Fred. Terry, who is excellent when he is himself and merely direct, as in the first passages of the interview with Torquenie, and whom we cannot wholly disapprove of even when, as elsewhere, he seemingly sets himself to swell the troop of those young serious actors of the day who imitate the leader of their profession—Mr. Irving.

To return for one moment to the play itself, in spite of our professions to leave it. On the night when I was present, the audience which had watched with extreme interest every turn of the narrative listened at the very end with an unconcealed coldness. I asked myself, what was amiss, or was it that the public, which, in matters of art, as I take leave to tell it, is wrong pretty often, was yet again wrong? On my honour, I think not. The very end is not satisfactory. To me it seems that, by the return of the unjustly convicted to the prison whence he came—though it is but for a year, and though he goes to save the painfulness of a disclosure to a woman who has tried to have ever mercy for him—it seems that, by the return of the unjustly convicted, the vulgar fault of the forced happy ending is avoided somewhat too ostentatiously. One’s sense of right is perhaps a little rudely shocked by the re-arrest of a man who had suffered too much to suffer yet again. Is it impossible that the ingenuity of Mr. Grundy—which is capable of much—should devise a method by which, without forcing upon the old blind lady the recognition of her dead husband’s infamy, the man who has been condemned for so long, in her dead husband’s place, should be rehabilitated in the sight of most?

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

STAGE NOTES.

“SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER” was to be produced one day this week at a matinée at the Vaudeville. The cast announced for the performance is of considerable strength, Mr. Kemble joining the company for the nonce to play Old Hardcastle, and Mr. Thomas Thorne, Mr. Thalberg, Mr. Frank Gillmore, Mr. Fred Thorne, Miss Emery, Miss Banister, and Mrs. Billington being included among the artists concerned.

PERHAPS the most admirable features in the attractive recital given by Mr. and Mrs. Pertwee at the Steinway Hall—where Mr. Algernon Lingo played and Mr. Van Lennep sang to the satisfaction of the audience—were, on Mrs. Pertwee’s part, the chanson “Ouvre les Yeux,” by Massenet, and Rubinstein’s “Rêve du Prisonnier”—given with the greatest possible effect; and on Mr. Pertwee’s part, a translation of Coppée’s solemn and impressive “Bene- diction,” and “The Signaller,” by Harrison, which recalls, in its spirit, more than one piece of heroic sentiment which we owe to Mr. Bret Harte. The whole occasion—of which it is now too late to speak in greater detail—was a thoroughly satisfactory one.

THREE representations of an original pastoral play, entitled “A Sicilian Idyll,” by Mr. Todhunter, author of “Helena in Troas,” will be given in the theatre of the Bedford Park Club, Chiswick, on the evenings of Monday, May 5, and Wednesday, May 7, and on the afternoon of Friday, May 9. The incidental music, including a hymn to Bacchus and a hymn to Love for a chorus of shepherds and shepherdesses, is composed by Mr. B. Luard Selby.

MUSIC.

MUSIC OF THE WEEK.

“MIGNON” was given at Drury Lane on Thursday week last. Miss Fanny Moody in the title rôle was particularly graceful and charming; her singing of “Knowest thou the land” and of the “Styrienne” gave marked satisfaction. Miss Fabris as Filina displayed much vivacity, and sang well. Mr. Celli made an excellent Lothario. The band under the guidance of Mr. Goosens played the delicate music admirably.

Mr. F. H. Cowen’s new opera “Thorgrim” is announced for next week, so perhaps it was to enable the public to look “upon this picture and on this” that Mr. Harris revived Vincent Wallace’s “Lurline” last Saturday evening. This work, produced at Covent Garden in 1860, contains some really pleasing music. In the first act especially the orchestra is employed with skill and a certain dramatic effect. But in the second and third acts the ballad element largely prevails; and this, coupled with the pantomimic plot and weak versification of the late M. E. Fitzball, tend to make the opera somewhat out of date. Mme. Georgina Burns as Lurline sang with brilliancy and power. Miss Grace Digby made an effective début in the rôle of Ghiva. Mr. Durward Lely looked well as Count Rudolph, but his voice showed signs of wear. Miss Jeannie Mills pleased in the small part of Liba. Mr. Aynsley Cook as the Baron, Mr. Crotty as Rhineberg, and Mr. M. Eugene as the Gnome, contributed to the success of the evening; for it certainly was a success. The opera was effectively mounted, the performance was excellent; and the public, some of whom came to revive memories of the past, some out of curiosity, were well disposed. Mr. Goosens conducted with his usual care. We forgive him the repetition of “Sweet spirit, hear my prayer,” which the gallery claimed as a right, but if he would not yield so readily to the demand for encores he would be helping in a good cause.

The programme of last Saturday’s concert at the Crystal Palace was devoted entirely to Wagner. Selections from his works, presented in chronological order, served to show the remarkable development of the composer, who began his art-career under the influence of Spontini and Meyerbeer, but ended it with individuality as striking as that displayed by Beethoven in his closing years. The excerpts, beginning with the “Rienzi” Overture, were all familiar, so that there is no occasion to enter into much detail. Mr. Manns gave a particularly refined rendering of the Siegfried-Idyll; and the “Lohengrin” Prelude and the Introduction to the third act of “Die Meistersinger” were also played with great effect. Miss Marie Fillunger sang “Elizabeth’s Greeting” from “Tannhäuser” and the closing scene from “Tristan” in good style, though her voice was at times overpowered by the orchestra. Mr. Henschel sang Wotan’s “Abschied,” but his best performance was afterwards in Sach's monologue, "Wie duftet doch der Flieder." The Siegfried "Trauermarsch" and the "Parsifal" Prelude brought the chronological programme to a close, and the "Kaisermarsch" terminated the concert. There was a fairly large and enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Henschel gave the first of his orchestral concerts for young people at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday afternoon. The programme included, among other things, three movements from Bach's Suite in D, Haydn's genial Symphony in G (B and H, No. 13), and some ballet music from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," all of which were well interpreted. Mrs. Henschel sang with her usual refinement and charm songs by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms. The object, and a most worthy one, of this afternoon series is to interest the young folk, and the works selected are such as they can easily understand. In thus providing profitable pleasure for the rising generation Mr. Henschel deserves liberal support.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

The Organist's Quarterly Journal, Part 85 (London Music Publishing Company), contains a pleasing and well-written "Andante grazioso," by K. I. Pye; a short and clever setting of the Chorale "Christ, der du bist der helle Tag," by D. Helps, of Leipzig; a transcription by the editor, Dr. Spark, of a duet and chorus from his Oratorio "Immanuel"; and a simple rhythmical March, by B. O. Wainwright.

The Day School Hymn-Book, with Tunes. Edited by Emma Mundella. (Novello.) The hymns have been chosen for schools in which the religious worship is undenominational in character. The tunes are by well-known authors, and such as have become familiar. The volume is exceedingly moderate in price, and there is little doubt that it will be welcome. In the concluding sentence of the preface the reasonable hope is expressed that the book will enable the young to appreciate all that is purest and best in sacred poetry and music.

Congregational Psalmist. Edited by Dr. H. Allon. (Hodder & Stoughton.) This is a third section of the well-known collection of hymn-tunes and anthems, and it contains additional anthems by composers of note, dead and living. Among the latter we find the names of Stainer, Prout, Gadsby, Elvey, and Hopkins.

A Lover's Dream. Poetry by J. Russell Lowell. Music by Charles Ernest Baughan. (Hopkinson.) This is an ambitious song, and the composer shows thought and feeling. The harmonies in the accompaniment are modern in character, and the chromatic element is somewhat too prominent; but Mr. Baughan is evidently anxious not to be trite.

Carmen Seculare. A Ludovico Campbell factum. Ab Herberto Oakeley musicis redditum. (Simpson & Co.) Some of the stanzas are in plain four-part harmony for tenors and basses, while in the others the voices sing in unison and octave with a contrapuntal accompaniment. The music is simple and stately.

De Nativitate Domini: Anthem for Christ-mastide, by W. Taylor (Novello), is well written. The tenor solo and chorus is the best section. The concluding part is somewhat spun out.

Tollers of the Sea and Good Night, by Henry Tolhurst (Swan), are two ballads, but not very attractive ones. We prefer the second.

A LAST LOVE: a Romance. GEORGES OHNET'S LAST NOVEL.—Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s.
By GEORGES OHNET, Author of "The Ironmaster," "Dr. Rameau," &c.
"If merit were measured by popularity, Georges Ohnet would stand, we imagine, nearly at the head of contemporary novelists. His merits and his defects alike conduce to the admiration with which the majority receive his work. He is undoubtedly an excellent craftsman. His plots are ingenious, his dialogue is bright, his books are free from all trace of tediousness."—Manchester Guardian.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY'S LIST.

Ready early in May.

LONDON PICTURES. Drawn with Pen and Pencil, by the Rev. RICHARD LOVETT, M.A., Author of "Norwegian Pictures," "Irish Pictures," &c. Profusely Illustrated. Imperial 8vo., 2s. cloth boards, gilt edges; 5s. Morocco, elegant.

This work carries out the purpose that has long been entertained of adding a well-illustrated book on London to the "Pen and Pencil" Series. Obviously, only the best-known buildings and most familiar phases of London life can be included in the limited space of one of these volumes. No labour has been spared to obtain correct illustrations, and to ensure accuracy in the letterpress. The desire of the author has been to produce not a guide-book, but a pleasant and entertaining volume, which shall direct the mind of the reader to the many rich and varied historical associations of London buildings, and to some of the fruitful suggestions furnished by the ever-shifting panorama of its life.

MODERN IDEAS OF EVOLUTION.

As related to Revelation and Science, by Sir J. WILLIAM DAWSON, C.M.G., LL.D., F.R.S., &c. Author of "Acanthian Geology," "The Chain of Life in Geological Time," "Egypt and Syria; their Physical Features in Relation to Bible History," &c. Crown 8vo., 2s. cloth boards. In this volume Sir William Dawson discusses in a calm and philosophic spirit the leading positions of the rival modern theories of evolution. He shows by conclusive evidence that we are by no means compelled to admit that the case for evolution is established. He shows that while science has reason to be grateful for the facts ascertained, revelation has yet nothing to fear from the actually destructive views of the present followers of Darwin. The book is worthy of the careful attention not only of ministers and men of science, but of all young and thoughtful readers.

THE BROOK and its BANKS. By the Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A., author of "The Handy Natural History," &c. With many illustrations. Imperial 16mo., 6s. cloth boards, gilt edges.

"Few writers have done so much to familiarise boys and girls with the simple facts of natural history as Mr. Wood, for he always painted the inhabitants of fields, forests, and rivers from actual eye-witness, and pressed home his lessons by cheery anecdotes sure to be remembered."—The Graphic.

"A reader of the book will be instructed without knowing it."—The Scotsman.

WHEN WE WERE BOYS. A Novel. By WILLIAM O'BRIEN, M.P.

In 1 vol. crown 8vo. price 6s.

DAILY GRAPHIC.—"An Irish story written by an Irishman, is pretty certain to be good reading, and Mr. O'Brien's novel is no exception to this rule. . . . The early chapters are almost as light-hearted as Lever, and when the plot thickens Mr. O'Brien is quite equal to the occasion, and the attack on Stone Hall and the Castle is told with great power and spirit. . . . The diagnosis of the Irish character, both deliberate and inferential, is excellent."

DAILY NEWS.—"The story is altogether delightful. There is enough in it for six stories. It is written with great sparkle, and with a sense both of fun and of humour which has not been equalled since Lever. The range of observation is very wide. It seems to include all classes in Ireland, from the lord and the lord's agent to the gommeen man and the informer. . . . Mr. O'Brien's dramatic instinct is enough to save him from all unfairness. . . . The book will help to draw two nations together by inspiring them with a common sympathy in laughter and in tears."

echoes of Parisian newspapers."—St. James's Gazette.

LITERATURE.

The Reconstruction of Europe. By Harold Murdock. (Longmans.)

THE third volume of Mr. Fyffe's History of Europe, as we lately pointed out in a review of that book (ACADEMY, March 29), dwells chiefly on the political aspect of events in Europe from 1848 to 1878. Mr. Murdock has made the military side of the same period the main part of his work; and, though he has noticed the great movements of Germany, of Italy, of Hungary, and of France, he has devoted special care to the gigantic contests which have been marked features of this grand age of trouble. His volume has merits from this point of view. It shows little knowledge, indeed, of the art of war, and it is disfigured by that worship of mere success, too characteristic of most of those who have described the campaigns of 1866-70; but the narrative, for the most part, is clear and good, and the battle pieces are well drawn and graphic. Occasionally, too, the political sketches are valuable, and show study and thought.

The principle of despotism, Mr. Murdock remarks, seemed enthroned on the continent in 1852. Louis Napoleon had restored the empire in France; the shadow of the power of Nicholas darkened central Europe; Austria was supreme in Germany, in Hungary, and throughout Italy; the national movement had failed at Frankfurt; and Prussia had returned to an autocratic government. Mr. Murdock, however, in his democratic faith, keeps out of view the important truth—the cardinal fact of these years—that the reaction towards absolutism and the rule of force was due to the anarchy and the wild extravagance of revolution in 1848-9; that movement had right and strength on its side, but it wanted true leaders, and it proved worse than fruitless. Mr. Murdock makes Louis Napoleon an object of scorn and ridicule throughout his book; the life of the emperor has yet to be told, and it is ignoble to cry down the fallen and the dead. But he is essentially wrong, though superficially right, in laying the Crimean War to his charge. His narrative of that eventful conflict, though savouring too much of Mr. Kinglake's book—a mischievous and fallacious history—is worth reading, and deserves attention. It is, on the whole, a tolerably good epitome of the first great war since the fall of Napoleon. In this, however, as in other parts of his work, Mr. Murdock shows that he has not studied war. He does justice, no doubt, to the defence of Sebastopol, to the heroism of Komiloff, and to Todleben's powers; and he points out correctly that the flank march after the Alma was thoroughly false strategy. But he does not indicate how, almost throughout, the dispositions of the allies were faulty; how the plan of attack at the Alma was misconceived; how the surprise of Inkermann would have been fatal but for the constancy of the British soldier—that mighty force which has redressed the errors of generals from Agincourt to Waterloo; how the siege, on the whole, was not well conducted; and how success was attained at last by mere brute force, not by skill in command. The Crimean War, in fact, does no credit to the capacity or the organisation for war of the two leading powers of Western Europe. This was largely the result of the long peace; but it certainly proves that the troops of the West are superior in the field to those of Russia. On the whole, Mr. Murdock, we think, gives too high praise to the Russian chiefs. He sneers at Louis Napoleon and extols Pélissier unfairly, as Mr. Kinglake does; and he is not just to Lord Raglan, or to the British army. Lord Raglan would have mastered Sebastopol after the Alma but for the death of St. Arnaud. The British army succumbed, as it did at Waloheren; but it fought as it did at Blenheim and Waterloo.

The Crimean War seriously weakened Russia, and greatly reduced her European influence, especially as Austria had declared against her. One of the chief results of the contest was to bring Sardinia into alliance with the West, and indirectly to strengthen the cause of Italy, which, after Novara, appeared hopeless. Mr. Murdock comments on the policy of Cavour; but he hardly does justice to that great genius, the ablest, perhaps, of modern statesmen. The immense superiority of Cavour is this, that he raised Italy into an independent state, not by perilous war or violent means, but through profound and far-sighted wisdom; how he controlled and directed Louis Napoleon, and made Garibaldi promote his ends, is a specimen of simply perfect statecraft. Probably Mr. Murdock does not like to realise, but history must record the fact, that Italy became a nation, not owing to the Mazzinis and enthusiastic dreamers, but because Victor Emmanuel was an able king, and one of her sons was a real statesman; had she followed the leaders of 1848-9, she might still have been in the bonds of Austria. Mr. Murdock gives us a fair account of the days of Magenta and Solferino, but he is not just to Louis Napoleon; and he does not dwell on the false strategy of the war, the inaction of Gyulai worthy of Mack, and the flank march from Gemon to the north, a movement, Sir William Napier remarked, which proved Napoleon III. to be no general. Italian independence perhaps led to the rise of Prussia, after 1859; it certainly weakened Austria and encouraged her rival. Mr. Murdock has given us an interesting sketch of Bismarck; but the revolutionist of "blood and iron" seems to us very inferior to Cavour. He certainly befooled Napoleon III., and he outwitted Austria in the Danish war; but we much doubt if he had a settled policy before 1864 or 1866; he exasperated Germany in 1866; and he risked too much when he defied Austria and the Federal League before Sadowa. That campaign proved the military strength of Prussia; but Bismarck could not be assured of this; and the fact, indeed, was not even suspected in Europe. If the ascendancy of Prussia is due to her army, this was the work of the king and of Roon and Moltke; nothing was due to popular movements or leaders. Indeed, Prussian Liberals fiercely opposed the military reforms that had done such wonders; and if Germany, like Italy, has become a great state, this has been accomplished by taking a course the opposite of that taken in 1848-9.

Mr. Murdock chimes in with the worship of fortune in extolling the Prussian strategy of the campaign of 1866. The invasion of Hanover, of Hesse, and of Southern Germany, was ably planned and ably directed; but you must blot out the deeds of Turenne and Napoleon before you can praise the operations against the Austrian army. The celerity, it has been said, of the Prussian movements excuses the dissemination of three armies along an immense and divided front, and the concentric advance, at wide distances, on Gitschin, within the reach of the enemy; but this is a misconception of the facts, and the apologies that have been made are mere sophistry. The Prussian armies were not "mobilised," and in their false positions, until the second week of June; the army of Benedek, about equal in numbers, was, at that time, in the north of Moravia, and ready to make an offensive movement; and a great chief would, in these circumstances, have advanced into Saxony, through the Bohemian hills, have shattered to pieces the weak Prussian centre, and have placed his enemy in Silesia in the extreme of peril. Even if Benedek had not taken this course, he could have been at Gitschin, with the mass of his forces, before the Prussians could have attained that point; he was at Olmütz on June 17; Prince Frederick Charles and the Crown Prince did not enter Bohemia until some days afterwards; and in this position he could have stood between divided foes endeavouring to unite, the most favourable position a general can hold. The strategy of the Prussians was, in truth, so faulty that, though Benedek threw every chance away, directed his army wrongly, and wasted its strength, still, even as late as June 28, he was in force between the two Prussian armies, and ought to have struck them right and left; and he retained this advantage up to the last moment, when he took his stand in the field of Sadowa. It is idle to praise the dispositions made by the Prussian commanders in this great battle; Prince Frederick Charles was for many hours exposed to immensely superior forces. Had Benedek been a man of resource, he ought to have crushed the Prince even with his beaten army by a determined movement across the Bistritz; and, in that event, the army of the Crown Prince, which reached Ohlum only in the afternoon, would have been, not victorious, but involved in defeat. It is difficult to believe that Moltke was the real author of these operations. What deserves admiration on the Prussian side is, not the direction of the forces in the field, but the marked superiority of the Prussian army, and the great pains taken after the war had closed in removing defects that had appeared in it. In justice, too, to Benedek, it should be said that, feeble and timid as his conduct was, his army was not to be compared to that of his foe in mechanism, in arms, or in moral power, and it was filled with discontented and unwilling soldiers.

Fortune favoured the policy of "blood and iron." Austria ceased to control the affairs of Germany; and Prussia became the chief German power, with military resources nearly doubled, and at the head of a cluster of vassal states. Mr. Murdock makes merry over the French Emperor and his bootless attempts to gain a "compensation" for the enormous increase of Prussia in strength. He certainly played a ridiculous part, and was outwitted and baffled by Bismarck; but history has yet to say whether trifling with France was far-sighted and really wise conduct. Napoleon III. was perfectly right in endeavouring to augment the French army. He saw that danger was at hand from Prussia; but he was crossed and thwarted by a most foolish faction—a circumstance which Mr. Murdock omits, for it is discreditable to French popular leaders. France declared war, when war came at last, against the wish of the ill-fated emperor; but the provocation was due to Bismarck, and time must decide whether this was statesmanship. The French army, though by no means so bad as Mr. Murdock says that it was, was hopelessly inferior to its foes in numbers; its organisation, too, was faulty; and it was caught by the Germans when in false positions, and when ill prepared for a tremendous conflict. We have no space to refer to the great war of 1870. Mr. Murdock has fairly described the battles; but he does not appreciate the combinations in the field, or the general direction given to events. He does not notice, for instance, that the paramount cause of the awful reverses of the imperial army from Wissembourg to Metz and Sedan was the sacrifice of military rules to politics; but for this the emperor would not have fallen, and France need not have signed the Treaty of Frankfurt. It is curious that, in describing this part of the war, he ventures to make a defence for Bazaine; but the marshal was alike an incapable chief, a miserable intriguer, and an unscrupulous traitor. Mr. Murdock does justice, in the second part of the war, to the energy and organising fame of Gambetta, and to the noble efforts of the illustrious Chanzy; but from first to last he has not brought out the real merits and defects of Moltke in the general direction of the German armies. Indisputably, Moltke made many mistakes. Had Napoleon stood in the place of Bazaine, Moltke would have rued the operations round Metz; and the advance on Paris was a grave error due to Moltke's contempt of the French character. Nevertheless, Moltke is a real chief; his march to Sedan, and the measures he took when he found himself committed to the siege of Paris, and when he had to cope with the national rising of France, were those of a captain of a very high order. It is believed that his was the ruling mind which required the cession of Alsace and Lorraine. If Bismarck set up this trophy of conquest, time again will tell whether this was prudent. The "reconstruction of Europe," which is the title appropriately given to Mr. Murdock's book, has led to a united Italy and a nearly united Germany; it has raised Christian races under the rule of the Turk in Eastern Europe from ignoble bondage; and it has contributed, on the whole, to the welfare of mankind. But it has left France brooding over schemes of revenge; it has turned the continent into an armed camp; and it may bring on an alliance between France and Russia of evil omen to the cause of progress.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

THE LATE DR. EDWIN HATCH.

Towards Fields of Light. Sacred Poems. By the late Rev. Edwin Hatch.

Memorials of Edwin Hatch, D.D. Edited by his Brother. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

THE wife and brother of Dr. Hatch have edited these two memorial volumes with the evident desire of repairing to the best of their power the loss caused to the public by his death. Dr. Hatch's death occurs at a moment peculiarly painful to the inner circle of his friends and pupils. He has become widely known as the champion of certain theories of Church history, and widely respected as a scholar and controversialist; but of the character that lay behind these externals, of the spiritual gospel which the author of the Growth of Church Institutions was striving to utter, the general public knows nothing. That Prof. Harnack should style Dr. Hatch "a great writer," and pronounce that "few books have been written so masterly as his Lectures," is not surprising to us; but we are surprised when the German critic continues: "but, above all, he was a glorious man, whose loss I shall never cease to mourn." These words cease to be extravagant and become very real as we read the volumes before us.

Of the Sacred Poems not much need be said. They reveal a genuine lyrical gift, and contain verses here and there which deserve to be remembered. They are fragments of great promise, but their author gave no sustained or deliberate attention to poetry; and his poems are valuable now, not as poetry, but as autobiography, as revealing the strength and delicacy of the poet's spiritual life.

The same is true, in part, of the twenty-five sermons contained in the Memorials. These are certainly very remarkable in themselves, apart from their personal interest, but still their main interest is personal. They tell us the convictions on matters religious and social of a writer who has not in these directions fully unbosomed himself elsewhere, and they prove how intelligent and strongly felt these convictions were. They once more negative the view that a liberal divine must be an indifferent one, that faith to be strong must be narrow. It is part of the duty of the Broad Church theologian to protest against what he conceives to be the fallacies and fanaticisms attached to the creeds of the two great parties in the English Church; and in so far as the popular mind identifies these creeds with their attendant fanaticisms, it supposes the Broad Churchman to be a lukewarm Sadducee, in spite of the witness to the contrary contained in the lives of Dr. Arnold, Robertson, Kingsley, and Maurice. These poems and sermons by Dr. Hatch will convince high and low alike, whatever be their opinion of his Bampton Lectures, that his religious life was intensely practical and personal and passionately strenuous.

The sermons cannot be said to represent their author's powers as adequately as his other published works. They are on a variety of subjects, and are as a general rule suggestive, not exhaustive; many of them could be elaborated into lengthy treatises. But this incompleteness makes all the more obvious the preacher's method of work.

"He was always penetrating to causes," says Prof. Sanday, describing pregnantly the combined exhaustive induction of facts and acute deduction of general laws which give their peculiar charm, not only to the Origin of Species, but to all historical works written with the same method, to Maine's Ancient Law, for instance, and Hatch's Bampton Lectures.

The sermons possess this charm. Not even the simplest enumeration of vices and virtues is haphazard, but always scientific and thoughtful. When a short sermon deals with a large subject, the author confines himself to one or two clearly-defined issues, and contrives to introduce some order and light into chaos. Occasionally, as in the two sermons on Humility, Dr. Hatch's power of seeing ancient history with contemporary eyes produces an entirely fresh and original treatment of a subject worn almost threadbare. The sermons contain many passages of fine imagination and nobly expressed eloquence. That Dr. Hatch possessed these gifts was obvious to any careful reader of his Bampton; but in the books he published they were necessarily subordinated, and to many readers the fire and energy of the sermons will come as a surprise.

To indicate with any minuteness the teaching of the book would take too much space—it is emphatically of the sort which defies summary; but we may notice generally that the preacher is thoroughly in touch with the spirit of the times. He feels the urgency of the social problem, telling us that "it would seem as though civilisation exuded misery," and denouncing the indifference of "the most impenetrable and immutable of all religions—the religion of the unthinking, well-to-do, and respectable." He will not allow religion to be less than life, and insists that Christianity can live only if it can do for the nineteenth century what it did for the first: "its strength lay in its spiritual force; in an age of misery it gave men hope, in an age which stood aghast at its own viciousness it gave them purity, in an age of conflict it gave them brotherhood." In every sermon we are struck by the spiritual energy of the preacher—his earnest identification of himself with his listeners; his strenuous insistence on the practical and personal character of real religion. "It is in the prose of life," he says, "rather than its poetry that the work of religion lies," and it is by the destruction of "the old Adam of idleness and arrogance and intolerance" that we become converted. It is singular that indolence should be so constantly and so feelingly denounced by one whose industry was so immense.

These Memorials greatly increase our sense of the loss sustained by the author's early death. They prove that the subjects upon which Dr. Hatch may be said to have spoken his mind to his generation were scarcely those nearest his heart, and they convince us that a few more years of life would have made him a great spiritual force in the Church and nation he loved. We have lost a prophet, not merely a teacher.

RONALD BAYNE.

The Heriots. By Sir Henry Cunningham. In 3 vols. (Macmillan.)

THIS is a work of genius. It tells the adventures of a poor and beautiful girl, launched by an unscrupulous woman of fashion upon the shoals and whirlpools of London society; of the temptations which beset her, the false lights that led her into peril, and the self-discipline by which she emerged safe. Sir Henry Cunningham brings to his task a practised hand, and a wide and sympathetic knowledge of life. It is the old pathetic story of youth at the cross roads, with the old, old choice before it, between the path of duty and the ways of worldliness. Olivia Hillyard is the female counterpart in our day of the Arthur Pendennis of fifty years ago. But Sir Henry Cunningham, with a true perception not only of the proprieties but also of the actual facts of modern society, makes his heroine a better and nobler human being than Thackeray's poor hero proved.

The story unconsciously challenges comparison in several respects with that masterpiece of English fiction. Both novels have, as their background, the idyll of an English country home. In both the principal figure passes from a station of moderate worldly comfort into pecuniary straits. The necessity of making their own way in life is the touchstone by which the leading characters in each of the novels are tried. In both, the battle with temptation, and with all the ignoble motives which tarnish life, is fought out amid the distractions of the London world. Thackeray lamented that since the days of Tom Jones no English author had ventured to truly portray a young man's life. He accordingly painted Arthur Pendennis in as comparatively realistic colours as he dared. Even thus toned down for the home market, the picture is not altogether a pleasant one. Sir Henry Cunningham has, with the insight of genius, perceived that it is still possible, without shocking British proprieties, to depict a young English lady as she really is. From the beginning to the end of his book there is not a page of twaddle, or a line of cant. We follow his heroine with interest, with admiration, with fear. But we lay down the third volume with the feeling that the story of an English girl's life, even if eclipsed for a moment by temptations to worldliness, can still be honestly told without bringing a blush to any cheek.

Those who are accustomed to Sir Henry Cunningham's earlier manner will expect to find everybody in his book somewhat wittier and a great deal more amusing than they would be in real life. This temptation to be excessively clever seems indeed to be the failing from which the more laborious and recherché order of novelist is seldom able to free himself. Whether in the parched Indian station of Dustypore, or amid the serene official altitudes of the Coeruleans, the agreeable people to whom Sir Henry Cunningham introduced us were all also so abnormally amusing that we missed that sense of simplicity which is the note of true genius. It is a blemish to which, considering the deluge of dull fiction that is daily poured down upon the world, it may seem hypercritical to object. In his present novel, however, Sir Henry Cunningham has been on his guard against his besetting foible. Nobody is wearisome in it, but a fair proportion of his characters are reasonably commonplace. He has in this way produced a higher effect of light and shade, and of the contrast between average mortals and the brilliant exceptions, than can be found in any of his previous books. The Heriots leave us with a large circle of new friends, whose acquaintance it has been a privilege to make, and many of whose sayings it is pleasant to remember. Our only objection is that too many of them are still too clever.

Several of the characters may fairly claim to be original creations in English fiction. The sketch of the old lady, not too rich or highly placed but, by the force of her own friendly and shrewd intelligence, the centre of a most agreeable coterie, is admirable. Many of us must remember a genial salon of this sort, and will agree with Sir Henry that no circle is complete without its cheery invalid. But I think few of us have ever found the charm which attracted us so well set forth as in Sir Henry's description of old Lady Heriot's drawing-room.

"It was a most amusing place. Lady Heriot's privileges as an invalid warranted just enough disorder to enhance comfort and banish the possibility of stiffness. Old age, like other infirmities, may, in skilful hands, become an element of social success. People came to see Lady Heriot in compliance with her petition to take pity on an old woman whose infirmities debarred her from the pleasures of the outside world. They invariably found a cheerful hostess, better posted up than themselves in current gossip, longing to know of what was going on in the world, and quite prepared to meet them half way in being amusing and amused. Lady Heriot had not lived all those years for nothing; she had known a host of people all the time her husband had been in Parliament, some of them already beginning to be historical. She remembered a story, and knew how to tell it. Her five o'clock tea was a most popular beverage; and quite a little crowd would gather to drink it. So it came about that, in the course of the afternoon, a great many nice people dropped in, and left a small residuum of wit behind them. It is a great thing to know a house where the hostess is always at home, and always delighted to see you. There were several elderly gentlemen who would have considered a Sunday in town exceptionally ill-spent part of which had not been passed by the side of Lady Heriot's sofa. Stonehouse, the distinguished Queen's Counsel, M.P., who had no leisure for ordinary society, managed to forget his briefs and his clients, and unbent his great intellect under the soothing influence of Lady Heriot's companionship. Mr. Pygmalion, a power in the world of art, was well pleased to convey to her the latest gossip from the Royal Academy. Dr. Crucible deserted his favourite arm-chair at the Athenaeum in order to bring an amusing book or expound the newest theory that stirred the philosophic world. Now it would be Lord Melrose, an accomplished ex-diplomat, untiring collector and retailer of every form of social curiosity; now Desmond, an Irish dean, providentially supplied with a never-failing cruise of excellent stories at his countrymen's expense. Even young Mr. de Renzi, the brightest of rising political stars, who was in great request, and capable of giving himself airs with common mortals, never showed them to Lady Heriot, but would come and spend a pleasant half-hour, and take real pains to be amusing. Lady Heriot's panegyric on her sofa was, Olivia felt, extremely well-deserved."

The question as to how far it is fair to an author to give the plot of his novel forms a fine point in the ethics of reviewing. My own opinion is clearly against it. Nor, indeed, would it be possible to summarise the story of The Heriots without blurring the hundred careful touches which will be found throughout the book. One comes to the conclusion, however, that if, as Lady Heriot says, "the trade of being an old lady is not such a bad one," the profession of a young beauty is a very arduous business. The final complication of Olivia's life can only be solved by a resolute answer to the question, "When is a girl justified in breaking off her engagement?" The orthodox answer with which we are so familiar is, "When she discovers something wrong or unsuitable in her fiancé." No small part of the interest of this book arises from the presentment of another aspect of the question. For after all a girl may know as little of her true self as she does of her lover when she becomes engaged to him. Sir Henry Cunningham leads up to this question with a delicate hand, and in the end produces a situation worthy of a dramatic artist of the highest class.

"Perhaps," says Mrs. Hazelden, "the first man a girl knows is generally the beginning of her disillusion." "Possibly," retorts De Renzi. "The fate of humanity is disillusion. Young ladies must be disillusioned like the rest of us. Men may be Nature's humble instrument. It may correspond to the acute form of it, which they themselves experience when they enter public life."

Sir Henry Cunningham has studied young ladies to advantage. We think it quite natural that a man's head should be turned by an early success, and that he should do many foolish and worldly things under its momentary influence, without being deteriorated by them in the long run. But there is a sort of tacit understanding that girls should either be above the indiscretions of sudden success, or that their nature must permanently suffer from them—in short, that a young beauty in the first flush of her triumph should either retain all the charms of unconsciousness and simplicity, or that she should become a worldly little person of the unhesitating type. It is one of the weak points of fashionable fiction that it usually portrays women in extremes. Sir Henry Cunningham touches off the feelings of his heroine, when suddenly shot from her rustic obscurity into a coruscation of success, with a more delicate hand.

"How do matters stand with a young girl," he says, "when she first discovers that she wields a spell which stronger natures than her own obey—which makes her a force among her fellow-mortals—when she knows that she is no longer insignificant—when it dawns upon her that someone admires her, delights in her, finds in her something more charming than in others? It was, Olivia felt, a disturbing revelation. A new world had suddenly opened upon her, full of exciting possibilities."

Very fine, too, is the chapter in which Olivia realises her social success at its real value. All the pleasures which fashion can give, the highest material triumph which to a girl it can bring, Olivia had enjoyed with the fresh capacity for enjoyment that youth alone possesses. Here are the two sentences with which Sir Henry Cunningham closes the chapter of disillusionment:

"'Little do men perceive,' says Bacon, 'what solitude is, how far it extendeth. For a crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love.' Of this sort of cruel, loveless solitude Olivia's gentle soul was now becoming painfully aware."

Our author has also his deeper notes. There are few touches of pathos in modern books more tender than his words of Requiescat over the child in whom the worldly uncle, and his still more worldly wife, had centred their unscrupulous ambition:

"In that little coffin lay the object of all Valentine's busy life, his eager contrivance, his restless energy. For him he had toiled, for him he had plotted, for him he had sacrificed things once dear to him, which only so transcendent a sacrifice could claim. He had silenced conscience; he had tampered with honour; he had forfeited his friend's esteem, his brother's love. Now all was over. Nothing remained to wish, to hope, to labour for."

The book is full of good things. It is impossible to turn over a few pages without coming on half a dozen shrewd sayings, which pack away the maximum of reflection or experience in the minimum of words. I am an easy-going reviewer, and read a novel for my own pleasure rather than for the benefit of the public. So not having marked Sir Henry's bon mots as I went along, I take a few at random, by no means the best. Olivia, at a certain crisis in her career, looks "like a young rebel angel of a determined order." "Like him!" says Olivia of a certain famous man of the world, "like eyes of blue steel, cold, cruel, hard! the smile of Judas, the sneer of Mephistopheles." "There is no more effectual estrangement," observes our author with regard to a little American lady's audacious talk—"there is no more effectual estrangement than a difference of taste in jokes." "As if," says Florian regarding another lady's bare shoulders and diamonds, "they imagined 'meretricious' to be the feminine of 'meritorious.'" "It was broader than it was long," says the same critic of a young guardsman's too lively Palais-Royal chanson, when it was encored as too short. "It was broader than it was long—the fashionable shape for comic songs." "Gratitude," remarks De Renzi, when a young lady asks him to be content with that form of affection—"gratitude is but the ghost of love." These and a score of other apothegms catch my eye in glancing over a few chapters in the last volume. There are touches here and there worthy of Thackeray. "I set him," says Lady Eugenia of her true-hearted son in their hour of distress—"I set him against a thousand misfortunes and am thankful."

I hope many other readers will derive as much pleasure as I have received from the perusal of this book. They will find the plot interesting and sustained to the end. Sir Henry Cunningham is a master of refined and scholarly English, and he lavishes a store of experience and a wealth of wit upon his work, very refreshing in these days of the hasty slipshod novel.

W. W. HUNTER.

An Artist's Tour: Gleanings and Impressions of Travels in North and Central America and the Sandwich Islands. By B. Kroupa. (Ward & Downey.)

MR. KROUPA, in spite of his Magyar-looking name, is an Englishman who has lived long in Scotland, and who, before beginning the extended journey of which the most striking incidents are described in this handsome volume, had passed much of his time in Canada.

These earlier travels are merely indicated. For the tale of his seven years' roamings—across the American continent, then to the Hawaiian group, back to California, south to Arizona, from the sea coast of Mexico south to Panama, thence to New Orleans and Havana, and finally northward by way of the Southern States to Canada—commences at New York. This route, from a geographical point of view, is not a new one. All its familiar features have been described a hundred times, and Mr. Kroupa makes no pretensions to be more than a tourist with a professional knowledge of painting. If, however, fifty men endowed with ordinary intelligence and a capacity for telling what they saw journeyed on the same forenoon from London to Staines, their narratives would all differ and all contain incidents unnoticed by their fellow travellers.

Accordingly, though it is difficult to say in what respect the latest sketches of what—with the exception of the Arizona trip in a "prairie schooner," and the ride in Northern Mexico with Navejo Indians—is now a beaten track, is fresher than his predecessors, his book is unquestionably worth reading, even by those who have already skimmed the pages of a library of similar volumes. One reason for this is that America is always changing. Ten years in the West is like a cycle of Europe; so that the man who revisits the places he knew in his youth seems to the newcomers like one risen from the dead. Another advantage Mr. Kroupa has over the ordinary "globe trotter" is that he was in no hurry. For a trip usually accomplished in a few months occupied him as many years; so that first impressions, sharp though indeterminate, were corrected by more mature experiences, and the vague notions picked up from the man in the car and the man in the steamer had time to crystallise into the well considered statements with which his pages abound.

But the interest of this "Artist's Tour" centres mainly in the artist himself—in the unconventional, often humorous, always shrewd, and occasionally picturesque descriptions he supplies regarding what he saw and did. Mr. Kroupa avoids the diary form. He has removed the scaffolding before he introduces his handiwork to the public. Dates are markedly absent from his pages, and indeed we can only gather from the context an inkling of the period about which he started on his roving. But we are never wearied with personal details as to what he ate and drank, nor with paraphrases of guide books; and, unlike the imitators of Captain Burnaby, patent pills are not by him accorded the immortality of print. Hence, from first to last the volume may be read with interest. For the writer is a modest narrator who never strains after effect, and has a way of his own in telling his quiet quaint story. His account of the present condition of the Mormons is useful; and, like every one else, he is pleased with California and charmed with the Sandwich Isles. But excellent though his description of the stock scenes in California are, the chapters narrating his experiences through Arizona, and in the company of those "tinkler loons" the Navajos, must be pronounced the most novel. Nor ought we to omit his notes upon Panama, which he explored on foot—and caught fever for his pains—far off the usual line of travel across that isthmus. In a book which contains little chaff, these pages will be found to contain the greatest amount of wheat; while the thirty-four illustrations, nearly all from the author's paintings, are capital specimens of one of the many photographic processes which are so rapidly superseding wood engraving.

Altogether, it is difficult to recall any travel talk not entitled to the rank of geography which is so satisfactory, and not many more pretentious narratives of explorations in new lands written in so inoffensive a manner. As a rule, Mr. Kroupa is accurate beyond the want of unscientific travellers, and seldom errs—even in his natural history. Yet here and there he falls into trifling mistakes, which he would do well to correct when a second edition is called for. Gold, for instance, was not first discovered by Captain Sutter at Coloma in 1848 (p. 31). The actual discoverer was James Marshall, who was cutting a mill-race for that old officer of Charles the Tenth's Swiss guard whom I am old enough to remember in the halcyon days of California. It is still further from the truth to affirm that the red wood is the same as the "sandal or Brazil wood" (p. 41), while its range is not to Mendocino, but to the most northern limits of the State, though De Candolle is utterly wrong in giving Nootka Sound as a habitat—a ridiculous blunder perpetuated without any excuse in the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. It would have been as correct to describe the palmetto as a native of Surrey. As the ample materials for its history now in existence might have taught the writer of the notice, forests of the redwood do not even extend into Oregon. Again (p. 57), "the Americans" did not adopt "the name sequoia gigantea" for the tree described with dubious taste by Lindley as Wellingtonia because it had been so dubbed by "a French botanist who visited and described these trees as early as 1854." It was Decaisne who established the generic identity of the "big tree" and the redwood, and therefore suggested the cancelling of the genus Wellingtonia. But he never either "visited or described" the species; and as his paper was published in 1855, while Lindley's appeared in 1853, even had there been any dispute over priority in nomenclature—which there never was—the English botanist would have had the first claim. The Buddhists might perhaps also protest against Mr. Kroupa characterising the Chinese as pagans with "gods" in their "Pantheon"; and a good many people who helped to erect it may object to the "English residents of Honolulu" (p. 171) arrogating to themselves the sole credit for the monument to Captain Cook in Kealakekua Bay. These slips are nevertheless of no great moment, except to specialists. And specialists, we have seen, are not infrequently "viri qui docent quod non sapiunt"—in Encyclopædias and elsewhere.

ROBERT BROWN.

VINET AS A LITERARY CRITIC.

Étude sur Alexandre Vinet critique littéraire.
Par Louis Molines. (Paris: Fischbacher.)

M. MOLINES has set himself the task of summing up Vinet's ideas and the principles of his literary criticism. He has done this with care and in detail. Although he has purposely abstained from biography, he gives us glimpses of Vinet's life in extracts from his correspondence with Emile Souvestre and Sainte-Beuve. What is thus shown makes one wish that more place had been allowed to personal matters. Vinet's literary companionship with Sainte-Beuve during the year which that distinguished writer spent at Lausanne is a fact, and an important one, in the history of French literature. The special note of his criticism is that it is a fruitful, a productive criticism. His literary judgments, according to Sainte-Beuve, "touch secret places" in the hearts of those he judges and "suggest serious thoughts." A writer criticised by Vinet learned to know his real self.

There are things said, and things left unsaid, by M. Molines (notwithstanding the merits of his book) which make one feel that he has not perceived the real charm of Vinet. He is at great pains to show that Vinet was original—that he owed nothing to personal intercourse with contemporary writers; and he falls into the error of representing him as a man influenced by books and not by persons.

"J'incline à croire qu'en réalité la seule influence étrangère qu'il ait subie est celle du livre."

Vinet lived with his books, but he was not bookish. An extract from one of his letters to Sainte-Beuve, which M. Molines has quoted in another place, shows in what spirit Vinet read:

"Quoique vous m'accusiez avec douceur de juger des hommes par leurs livres, je veux bien vous donner lieu de me le reprocher encore, et vous avouer que c'est votre pensée intime, votre vrai moi, qui m'attache souvent dans vos écrits."

M. Molines finds fault with Vinet for having "made himself too little" and declined opportunities for practical influence.

"On regrette de le voir se soustraire aux charges, on pourrait parfois dire aux obligations que lui imposait la confiance de ses amis. Il refuse la place de directeur de l'instruction publique dans le canton de Vaud; il refuse la place de professeur à la Faculté de Montauban que lui offrait M. Cousin; il refuse la direction du journal Le Semeur en alléguant son incapacité."

Vinet gave this reason for his refusal:

"En me transplantant on m'effeuillerait, et l'on serait tout étonné de n'avoir plus entre les mains qu'un arbre sec."

Such words give life to the page on which they are written. There is a sympathy which it is impossible to withhold from beings that will not bear transplanting. Vinet spent his first and last years in his native city of Lausanne. He enjoyed the happiness so touchingly expressed by Mme. de Staël of ending life amid the scenes where it began:

"La tombe rapprochée du berceau semble placer sous le même ombrage toute une vie; tandis que les années passées sur un sol étranger sont comme des branches sans racine."

M. Molines complains that Vinet "is not appreciated in France as he deserves to be"; and he mentions the three reasons given by M. Schérer for such want of popularity—"Vinet was a foreigner, a Christian, and a Protestant." Unpopularity is a peculiar thing, for which three reasons are too many; one is enough. That Vinet was a foreigner was no reason for his being unpopular in France. As a matter of fact, French literary and philosophical innovators in search of a name to conjure with have held up names of foreigners—Voltaire that of Newton and Locke, Victor Hugo that of Shakespeare. Vinet was a Protestant, but no sectarian; and it is not the doctrine but the sectarian spirit of Protestantism which offends the feelings of Frenchmen. In a letter to Chateaubriand he says:

"Je suis protestant, il est vrai, mais dans un sens si général, si peu historique, que je ne me sens étranger dans aucune enceinte lorsque j'y retrouve cette foi en la charité divine, ce recours au mystère de l'incarnation, et cette bonne volonté du repentir, qui sont la consolation, la couronne, et l'humble triomphe de notre existence foudroyée."

And Sainte-Beuve says that Vinet was "the most sympathetic of Protestants."

Vinet was a Christian; so was Pascal, and yet Pascal has had more editors during the present century in France than Voltaire. But Pascal, though in his latter years he became a recluse, imbibed in his youth the Parisian esprit de société, when he lived and exchanged ideas with men of wit and gallantry. Vinet remained what Pascal might have been had all his life been spent in a provincial city. Small countries, with great neighbours and a common language, acquire a taint of provincialism. Provincialism was the real cause of Vinet's want of popularity in France.

What did Vinet really wish for—admirers or readers? An author who reaches the stage of popularity loses better readers than he gains. There is too much of him in circulation. People think they know him too well to read him. He is quoted and misquoted till his words are emptied of their sense and meaning, and what survives of him is a name. Vinet belongs to a class of writers who will always find readers, because they will never attain popularity. He likened himself to a tree that could not bear transplanting; and he has among writers the virtues of mountain plants that will not thrive in the air of the plain. He was a loveable man; there was in his companionship a moral tonic that refreshed men of the most various intellects, and a few of the best French spirits in every generation will turn to Vinet for refreshment.

NEW NOVELS.

Dulcibel. By Gertrude M. Hayward. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

Claire Brandon. By Frederick Marshall. In 3 vols. (Blackwood.)

The Lloyds of Ballymore. By Edith Rochfort. In 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

The Captain of the "Polestar," and other Tales. By A. Conan Doyle. (Longmans.)

Mrs. Danby Kaufman of Baywater. By Mrs. Mark Herbert. (Digby & Long.)

Fair Phyllis of Lavender Wharf. By James Greenwood. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

By the World Forgot. By E. J. Clayden. (Frederick Warne.)

Dulcibel is a novel which takes a good deal of reading. It is one of the many testimonies our modern fiction affords to the influence exercised by Browning on his generation. The author, without being a great creative genius, has contrived to seize upon some tolerably distinctive types of character and to analyse them well. It may be objected that her task is the easier for the simple reason that the characters are so distinctive. The laughing careless Christopher Jocelyn—without an atom of real character, "a nature so made up of broken lights and shades that the strong force of contrasting traits was lost in their abundance," but a universal favourite, and bound to win in any game of love—no doubt has his counterpart in real life. So has his rival, Arthur Scudamore, the local squire, who, being gifted with clever brains and artistic tastes, fails to win the sympathy of his country neighbours and assumes an attitude of Byronic cynicism little in keeping with his really warm nature. Dulcibel Carwinion the heroine, brought up, in companionship with her brother Michael, to a stern sense of self-reliance, owing to the gentle weakness of her father, is neither an unnatural nor unlovable person. But where typical developments are so strongly marked there is less difficulty in creating vivid contrasts than where, as for instance in some of George Eliot's novels, the analysis of commonplace characters is an especial feature. However, we must not quarrel with Miss Hayward over what is really a very good novel. She is at fault, perhaps, in allowing her interest in her own creations to run away with her; for it is not every novel-reader who cares to pursue deep studies through three volumes. On the other hand, the studies are decidedly artistic in execution; and the author's style exhibits an aptitude in choice of metaphor and a power of sympathetic description which place her book on a high level of merit. More care might have been exercised in verifying some of the quotations that head the chapters. Horace, for instance, never wrote "poterius nasci madre pudenda" (vol. i., p. 172).

If Christian names count for anything, the author of Claire Brandon should be of the male sex. In that case, all that can be said is that his manner of writing conceals the fact wonderfully well. Mere prolixity, though a tolerably frequent characteristic, is not, indeed, the exclusive property of lady novelists; and it is possible that the industrious attention paid in these pages to realistic minuteness, the exhaustive parade of sorrow's vocabulary, and the exuberance of petty detail in the love scenes—kissing and all—may be the work of a man. But the conception of the heroine, a young lady of somewhat narrow-minded obstinacy, who makes not only all men but all womankind her slaves, is distinctly feminine; nor is it easy to imagine that any one but a woman would have imputed moral crime to George Brandon, who, in the absence of legal proof of the legitimacy of his brother's daughter, lays successful claim to the family estates. There is no lack of cultivated thought in the pages of Claire Brandon, and, apart from its unnecessary length, it is not a badly conceived novel in respect of plot. It faults seem mainly due to crudeness and inexperience in writing. The dialogues want mending. They are like professorial lectures. Every abstract term under the sun is trotted out for definition and discussed in polished essayist style on the spur of the moment by ordinary society loungers. The characters also want mending. They start with a certain amount of individuality, which in many cases they quickly lose and become a mere reflex of the writer's own mind. And surely the inanities of Lytton and Disraeli at their worst are more than parodied by a writer who, in the absorbing moment of a love declaration, can represent his hero and heroine as finding time for talk like this:

"Then, sweet Claire, remember ever that Nature, who is love, looked on us and rejoiced when we told our love to each other and to her."

"What a radiant omen for our love!" sighed Claire. "What a tender and undying witness of its birth! How gloriously privileged we are, Conrad, to tell each other our avowal in the presence of such a confidant! Look! . . . Feel! . . . She casts over us the protection of her royalty, the grace of her simplicity, the eternity of her fidelity! In our hours of trial we will remind each other of this enchanting scene, of this incomparable moment, and we will find encouragement and fortitude in the memory of our beginning," &c., &c.

In truth, the sentiments of these two lovers towards one another are, throughout the book, so aggravatingly ecstatic as to encourage in the reader a cynical hope that their married life may produce some compensatory disillusion.

It is impossible to bestow upon The Lloyds of Ballymore anything more than that faint sort of praise which is often tantamount to condemnation. As a mere story it is fairly well told; and though of reflective analysis, or startling contrasts of character, or dramatically devised situations, no trace can be found, there is life enough in the descriptions of country scenes and Hibernian peasantry to make the book acceptable to Irish readers. John Lloyd, the leading figure in the first volume, an improvident Irish landlord, is murdered by moonlighters, the assassins being two of his own tenants. The impoverished family remove to Dublin, where young Tom Lloyd, the heir, now a bank clerk, is suspected of a robbery and tried at the assizes. Though acquitted of the charge, he loses his post; and the suspicion attaching to his name has the effect of putting an end for a time to more than one matrimonial alliance, until the mystery is cleared up by the death-bed confession of the real culprit. There is nothing very original in any of this, and little in the execution to lift the book out of a rather dull level of homely mediocrity. Miss Rochfort should, in particular, avoid padding her novel with dialogues largely composed of irrelevant gossip, and with reiterated descriptions of toilet details and the dinner menu.

Hardly more than twelve months have elapsed since Dr. Conan Doyle astonished and delighted the world with the narrative of Micah Clarke; and when another work by his hand is announced, one rushes to it with eager expectancy. It is no little disappointment to find that The Captain of the "Polestar," and other Tales, is a mere réchauffé of productions that have already seen the light in various magazines. One looked for a prodigy, and, behold, a potboiler! Apart from this legitimate grumble, there is nothing to be said in disparagement of the stories themselves, which are ten in number, and are, on the whole, of that high class which might be expected of the author. "John Huxford's Hiatus" is delightfully pathetic, and "The Parson of Jackman's Gulch" is remarkable for what might be called in stage phrase a "screaming" dénouement. The writer has a tendency to coquette with the supernatural world and unexplained psychological phenomena. The practice is excusable perhaps in short magazine stories, but might fatally discredit a sustained work.

In respect of title, Mrs. Danby Kaufman, of Baywater, may seem to be an imitation of Mr. Barnes of New York and Mr. Potter of Texas. Though not distinguished by any of the bewildering intricacy of manoeuvre and unceasing restlessness of movement that characterise the two latter works, Mrs. Herbert's novel is not without solid merits of its own. Mrs. Danby Kaufman herself is a sort of femme terrible, fast in her habits, heartlessly indifferent to her husband and children, and possessed of a bitter tongue and satirical pen which have served to alienate, through fear or disgust, most of her more reputable acquaintances, and even the members of her own family. That a woman of this sort should be brought to shame and repentance at the close of the book is only fitting and natural; but that her expiation should be represented as consummated by her joining the ranks of the Salvation Army is hardly likely to pass for a thoroughly satisfactory ending. The chief interest of the story centres in Ethel Bright, who, as a girl, had been persuaded by Mrs. Kaufman, then Joan Sival, to go through a ceremony of marriage with her brother Jack, and lives in constant dread of her present husband finding out the secret. The tale exhibits considerable originality of conception, and is worth perusal.

Arrowsmith's sensational series, which had the good fortune to be brought into notice by Mr. Hugh Conway's Called Back, and which has since been reinforced by more worthy productions, now adds to its list a blood-curdling and thoroughly characteristic story called Fair Phyllis of Lavender Wharf, by James Greenwood, the famous "Amateur Casual." It is a narrative which exhibits in happiest perfection the writer's laboriously acquired knowledge of the morality and habits of London's lowest grades of society. Such paragons of murderous ferocity and devilish cunning as are here exhibited to view in the brothers Mungo and Judas Marks, with the feminine complements of the picture, as represented by the elderly hag, Nan Spurway, and the beautiful demon, Phyllis—surname unknown—could only be properly depicted by one who had made the study peculiarly his own. There is no doubt that this is a good shillingsworth—in its way.

By the World Forgot is a very pretty little tale, and Miss Clayden ought to be heard of again as a novelist. The subject is not particularly original—what subjects are nowadays?—but the charm inherent in well-drawn characters is independent of the limited conditions of actual life. And everything here is actual life. The well-meaning vicar and his worldly-minded, domineering wife; Mr. Grey, the broken-down literary man, taboed by the vicarage, and, as a consequence, by local society, on account of agnostic proclivities; his daughter Helen, intellectually—through training a femme d'esprit, and socially—through force of circumstances—an ingénue; Allan Aubrey, the roving artist—this, it must be confessed, is a little too hackneyed—and many other characters, are people we know by heart. The merit of the novel lies in its treatment, which is rather in the style of Mrs. Henry Wood; and those who like Mrs. Henry Wood will like this imitation.

JOHN BARROW ALLEN.

SOME CLASSICAL TEXTS.

The Birds of Aristophanes. With Introduction and Notes, by W. W. Merry. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.) No lover of the Aristophanic comedy will regret meeting the Rector of Lincoln College in the sacred precincts. As in his edition of the Frogs, so here, Dr. Merry shows the indispensable quality of being up to the fun of the thing, as well as to the required scholarship. He can see that the Aristophanic irony permeates the whole piece, and that the gaudy triumph of Peithetaerus at the end is as much a "Rogue's March" to the rogue himself as to the Athenian audience. Wisdom and poetry sparkle in the depths of this torrent of extravagant fun, like the gold in Pactolus; but the solemn political lesson supposed to be enforced by the play has been far too solemnly contemplated and investigated. Viewed as the main object of the drama, it obscures its brilliancy and throws the whole thing out of perspective. There is a lesson—a sound and solemn one—in the career of Falstaff; but fancy taking it from that point of view throughout! It was, we suppose, necessary to thrash out anew the much-thrashed straw of Süvern's essay; but Dr. Merry, as might be expected, does so briefly (Introd. pp. 14-18), recognising that characteristics and foibles, not incidents and expeditions, are the butt of Aristophanes. The notes seem to us to avoid the extremes—scantiness and superfluity—very well. It is hardly true to say (l. 39) that τέττιγες or cicadas "in no way resemble" grasshoppers, with which they are often confounded. Resemblance there is, though not identity. We confess to an impression that (l. 177) διαστροφόμενοι = "squint," rather than "wring my neck." Some of Dr. Merry's equivalents are extremely felicitous, e.g., l. 1421 "εὐθεὶ Πέλλης," "straight for Pellene," a village in Achaia, famous for the manufacture of warm woollen cloaks—as we might say to Ulster." Again, l. 298, "the κρηῖλος is called κρηῖλος, to suggest κρηῖν, and so point an allusion to the well-known barber Sporgilus. As though we called the bird not a 'dipper' but a 'clipper.' But why so practised a teacher as the Rector of Lincoln should think it necessary to construe the substantives in ll. 527-8, passes comprehension; and the same may be said of such notes as those on ll. 1155-1159. To conspire against the use of the lexicon is to conspire against scholarship.

The Iphigenia at Aulis. With Introduction and Notes by Olinton E. S. Headlam. (Cambridge: University Press.) Mr. Headlam, with an enthusiasm that sits well on an editor, says of this play that "in its conception and execution it is worthy of the poet at his best. . . . There is here no trace of falling power or enfeebled judgment. . . . Barely, if ever, has the mingled tenderness and dignity of Euripides secured him a more splendid triumph."

The reading world has not, we think, as a rule taken so favourable a view. Partly from the impression that the play lacks the last touches of the poet; partly from suspected interpolations; partly from the natural sequel having been earlier produced—the play has been, not indeed disregarded, but somewhat depreciated. To us, the opening scene appears most dramatically conceived. The character of Iphigenia, if it does not quite, as Mr. Headlam thinks, "exhibit the hand of a master," is certainly one of Euripides's finest creations, missing only by a little the supreme success of Sophocles's Antigone; Agamemnon is a sketch of hesitancy worthy of Clough, though not of Shakspeare; Achilles has the charm of a direct and soldierly character. But the element of greatness is absent from the play as a whole, though an admirable pathos pervades it. The introductory matter (pp. vii.-xxviii) prefixed by Mr. Headlam is concise and interesting. The chronological table of art, literature, and politics, comprised in the Euripidean period is useful, and might, we think, be profitably appended to other editions of Euripides for beginners. The notes are, we think, a little too frequent, though they are as a rule concisely expressed, and avoid for the most part that disastrous competition with the lexicon which spoils both boys and editions. We observe that, on l. 919, Mr. Headlam quotes ὀδύρην τέτρα from Aeschylus, and ὀδύρην πύργον from Sophocles (without giving the references) as examples of emphasis falling on the first part of the compound—i.e., ὄδρ, ὀδρς. But such is not Mr. Tucker's view of ὀδύρην τέτρα, in his new edition of the Supplikes; as to ὀδύρην, it differs, we suppose, from ὀδρς as "upstanding" differs from "upright," i.e., one personifies the figure a little more. After all, we talk of the "foot" of a hill. The note on l. 447 seems to unravel the passage skillfully. On the whole, this is a promising piece of work.

Pliny's Letters. Books i. and ii. With Introduction, Notes, and Plans. By J. Cowan. (Macmillan.) Mr. Cowan has done a very useful piece of work in adding two books of Pliny's Letters to "Macmillan's Classical Series." He has selected, it is true, but a small portion of his author; but that portion he has explained and illustrated fully. He has taken pains to point out where the constructions employed by Pliny differ from those of Cicero; and his notes constitute a useful lesson in Latinity and the history of Latinity, as well as in the interpretation of the author's meaning. The introduction, on the life of the younger Pliny, is one of the best workings-up of the indispensable article by Mommsen which we have seen. It was a happy idea to give at full-length two of the extant inscriptions which refer to the younger Pliny; but it is surely not right to explain O' PLINIO L' F' OVF CAECILIO SECVNDO by saying that OVF = Oufentina: it is the regular abbreviation for Oufentina (tribu). In Letter, i., 22, 6, in toga negotiosque versatur, though Mr. Cowan probably understands it as we do, his translation ("his duties as a citizen") is hardly explicit enough. The word toga already contains the idea which is expanded in the next sentence by advocatione, and means the legal profession, just as it seems to do in Tacitus, Annals xi. 7.

The Histories of Tacitus. Books III.-V. With Introduction and Notes. By A. D. Godley. (Macmillan.) This continuation of a work which has already been noticed in the ACADEMY is marked by growing independence and self-confidence in the editor. Relying less on what has been done before him, he makes his own notes, and he has a very good idea of where a passage calls for explanation and a learner for help. Nor are his notes merely explanatory. They often point out—and very neatly, too—where and how the syntax of Tacitus differs from that of Cicero. On the whole, this useful little edition should be popular and widely used. But we have, of course, occasionally to dissent from Mr. Godley on some points of interpretation. We doubt whether clementiam in iii. 19 by itself = famam clementiae; more probably that meaning is acquired by the hendiadys clementiam et gloriam. In iii. 23 vincla can hardly be "chains," for chains could not be cut in a hurry by two soldiers; rather "ropes." In iv. 86 intelliguntur artes, sq., we cannot clearly understand Mr. Godley's note; but we are inclined to take the passage as Mr. W. H. Simcox did, making the obsequium to be that of the bystanders, who took good care not to offend either Mucianus or Domitianus by letting out what they saw. By some curious accident Mr. Godley prints (with Halm) piatos in iii. 25, but comments on the reading placatos. On p. 148 and in index read "Vipstanus Messalla" for "Valerius Messalla."

Selections from Valerius Maximus. With Notes by W. B. Inge. (Rivingtons.) The series of "Selections from Classical Authors" to which this little volume belongs, is intended to give young people "a first acquaintance with the great writers of Greece and Rome." Mr. Inge shows a good deal of wisdom as well as of taste in his choice of passages; and the young reader ought to get plenty of amusement out of Valerius's tales. But the extreme slightness of the commentary makes it difficult to say much of it. There is not nearly enough help—especially grammatical help or downright explanation of the meaning—for pupils trying to get a first acquaintance with a Latin author. So many legitimate difficulties are passed over that we fancy Mr. Inge must have forgotten his own schooldays. The obscuring punctuation of p. 17, l. 9, too, will be found puzzling to schoolboys; and so will the unheard-of concessoribus printed for concessoribus on p. 19. In the story which Valerius Maximus tells after Cicero in Book VIII. (p. 192 here), we should like to hear the translation of causae periclitantis argumentum well discussed. Mr. Inge understands it to mean that Cicero "found a new argument for the defendant." But, then, what becomes of periclitantis? Why should not the words mean that Cicero pointed to a proof of his adversary's case being a shaky one?

The Ethics of Aristotle. Analysed, Annotated, and Translated for Oxford Passmen. By S. H. Jeyes. (W. H. Allen.) Although Mr. Jeyes has written a manual of the passman's portion of the Ethics—and a very good manual, too—he knows well how little the help given by such works can take the place of personal study. "Candidates," he says, "are recommended to begin by going once or twice through the whole of the Greek text"; and, if they really will do that, then we believe that, with Mr. Jeyes's aid into the bargain, they will be sure of passing their examination. Mr. Jeyes's analysis and notes are clear and business-like; and, in nearly every case where we have tried the translation upon test-passages, we have found it satisfactory. There is, however, one passage in which Mr. Jeyes is certainly wrong, and there is one in which we think he is wrong. The former is Book iii. 5, 7, θερμυλεσθαι ἢ ἀλγεῖν. He translates it "to feel hot or cold"; and we are not surprised, for the occurrence of θερμυλεσθαι has lured many a translator to his doom. In iv. 8, 9 he renders the last sentence, "In this spirit will a refined and generous man govern his conduct, being like a law to himself." But surely the ὅτις ἔτι means that he will act as if there really were a law putting a limit upon jeers; for he will be his own law. The usefulness of the book would be increased if the top of each page had some indication of where we are in the text.

Cornelii Taciti de Vita et Moribus Julii Agricolae Liber. Ad fidem codicum edidit A. E. Schöne. (Berlin: Calvary; London: Nutt.) Dr. Schöne has issued a rather boldly emended edition of the Agricola. In the task of correcting the text of Tacitus where it is, or seems to be, faulty, he makes more use of the poets than previous critics have done. He appears to have started from the admitted fact that Tacitus's expressions are coloured by his studies in poetry, and are, indeed, often adapted from poets; to have read himself full of the Roman poetry of a certain period; and then to have fallen upon the text of Tacitus with a determination that poetry shall give him the key to all that is hard. He adduces many curious parallels of languages, which we are glad to have; and he ventures many corrections which cannot be so readily accepted. Some prose-writers, too, however, are pressed to yield parallels; as when Livy's part nobilitate (44 l.) is adduced in favour of altering quas equestri nobilitate est (Agric. 4) into aequae equestri nobilitatis, which, indeed, is nearer to the MSS. In chap. 15 he prefers malum to manus (alterius manus centuriones), and explains by alterius mal-fici homines, centuriones; comparing a rather dissimilar phrase of Cicero, who calls Verres calamitas Sculorum. But these suggestions are comparatively conservative.

Sophokles' König Oidipus. Für den Schulgebrauch herausgegeben von Friedrich Schubert. (Leipzig: Freytag.) German school-books are often great offenders in the matter of paper and print. If this little edition still leaves something to be desired in the former matter—the paper being neither quite white nor quite untransparent, the print and margin, &c., on the other hand, are excellent—it is a pleasure to read and annotate under such conditions. The "Einleitung," and the "Anhang" on "Das Theaterwesen in Athen," are, as they should be, common to the series, of which we have already seen the Antigone. We observe in the text a certain leaning to some drastic conjectures—e.g. in l. 1098 the conjecture κορῶν is adopted for ἀρα, unnecessarily, we think. In the same chorus the MSS. reading, ἡνδὲ δρεσιβάτα προστελασθεῖσ', is defective by one syllable after the second word. Herr Schubert accordingly adopts the reading λέκτροις τελασθεῖσ'. But, as Jebb sees, Lachmann's conjecture, κατὰς τελασθεῖσ', is better, as explaining the corruption, κατὰς having been written προς.

NOTES AND NEWS.

AN influential committee, consisting of heads of houses, professors, and tutors, has invited the members of the International Congress of Orientalists to hold their next meeting at Oxford. Prof. Max Müller has been asked to accept the presidency of the congress. The invitation has been accepted; and the standing committee has elected an international committee, in which each European country will be represented by one scholar. Among these representatives are Kuenen, Dillmann, Whitney, Bühler, Schefer, Guidi, Lieblein, von Rosen, Landberg, Naville, Midhat Bey, &c. The congress is to take place in 1892.

AN interesting discovery has been made in Manchester. Mr. J. E. Cornish, the well-known bookseller, possesses an extensive stock of old books and MSS., including a collection from which there came, some years ago, the original score of Handel's "Messiah," now one of the treasures of Buckingham Palace. Mr. Cornish's hope of finding other Handel autographs has not yet been realised; but Dr. Henry Watson, in examining the musical MSS., has come across several in the handwriting of Mozart. There are two of the concertos written in his childhood, and several numbers of "Mithridate," the opera which came into being when the musician was at Milan in 1770. These Mozart autographs, like the Handel MSS. already mentioned, form part of the collection formerly owned by Mr. Thomas Kerlake of Bristol.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON will publish very shortly a new text of the Divina Commedia, carefully revised, with the aid of the most recent editions and collations, by Mr. A. J. Butler, well known to Dante scholars for his prose translation of the Purgatorio and Paradiso. Fifty copies will be specially printed on Japanese paper.

MR. GLADSTONE has entrusted the late Sir Stephen Glynne's Notes on the Churches of Lancashire and Cheshire to Canon Atkinson, Vicar of Bolton, who is editing them for the Chetham Society, with supplementary notes.

MR. WHISTLER has consented to allow an authorised edition of The Gentle Art of Making Enemies to be published by Mr. William Heinemann. It will contain some things not included in the piratical edition, which has been surreptitiously introduced.

MR. HEINEMANN will also be the publisher of two new books by Mr. Robert Buchanan: The Moment After, a story in one volume; and a collection of essays entitled The Coming Terror.

MR. FREDERICK J. CROWE is writing a biography of Cherubini for Messrs. Sampson Low & Co's Series of "Great Musicians."

THE last two volumes of the Memoirs of Duke Ernest will be issued by Messrs. Remington & Co. in about a week's time; and also a new work by Dr. Gordon Stables, entitled The Mystery of a Millionaire's Grave.

MESSRS. W. SMITH & INNES have in the press a new volume by Mr. John Watson, entitled Nature and Woodcraft, which will be illustrated by Mr. G. E. Lodge; and also Truth with Honour, a story by O. R. Coleridge and M. Bramston.

AN anonymous work, entitled, God in His World: an Interpretation, reported to be by the editor of one of the leading American magazines, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. METHUEN & Co. will publish at an early date Curiosities of the Church, by Mr. William Andrews. It consists of a series of studies of singular services, curious customs, remarkable records, ancient accounts, and other old-time lore.

MR. DAVID WINGATE, known in Scotland as "the collier poet"—to whom a pension of £50 on the Civil List was granted in 1882, at the same time as to Mr. Edwin Waugh—proposes to issue a selection of verses from his four volumes, which are now all out of print. The only long poem given entire will be "Annie Weir"; the rest will be short lyrics. There will also be a portrait of the author, finely engraved. The volume is to be published by subscription, through Messrs. Kerr & Richardson, 89 Queen Street, Glasgow.

MISS VERA KARSLAND and her brother, Mr. Collis Karsland, have collaborated in the writing of a sensational story, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Trischler under the title of The Witness Box, or the Murder of Mr. A.B.C.

MR. F. S. ELLIS has sent to the Clarendon Press the first part of his Shelley Lexical Concordance, which he hopes to finish for the Shelley centenary in 1892. His careful work has naturally found out the Philological Society's Dictionary readers. They evidently did not note—or the sub-editors and editor missed—Shelley's use of "the Above" for God, and "aught" as an adjective for "any": neither of these appears in the New English Dictionary, though "aught" = "any" occurs several times in Shelley's works.

THE Religious Tract Society has just made a grant of £20 towards the production of The Pilgrim's Progress for the blind in the island of Formosa. It will be published in the Braille type, which the Chinese are now able themselves to prepare, and will be the eighty-fifth version of Bunyan's book.

ON Friday next, May 2, Messrs. Sotheby will sell what is described as "a portion of the valuable library of a gentleman." It consists mainly of that class of books which were more sought after a few years ago than they are now—productions of the Aldine press, other early printed classics, French engravings of the last century, English engravings of the early part of the present century, art books generally, and topographical works. All are choicely bound, and in beautiful condition.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK's bill for amending the Public Libraries Acts will again be considered at the adjourned meeting of the Library Association, to be held at 20 Hanover Square, on Thursday next, May 1, at 5 p.m. Sir John Lubbock has promised to take part in the discussion, and visitors are invited to attend.

A MEETING of the Marlowe Memorial Committee was held on Friday last, April 18, in the rooms of the Lord Chief Justice, at the Law Courts. Lord Coleridge took the chair; and among those present were Mr. A. H. Bullen, Mr. Arthur Bourchier, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, Mr. Joseph Knight, Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. Justin H. McCarthy, and Mr. James Ernest Baker (hon. sec.). It was announced that Mr. E. Onslow Ford had consented to design the monument. Mr. Bram Stoker stated that Mr. Irving and Miss Ellen Terry proposed to contribute £100 from the proceeds of their readings in St. James's Hall next July. A sub-committee was appointed to organise a dramatic performance at one of the principal theatres. Many members of the dramatic profession have signified their willingness to promote the success of the undertaking.

WITH all Shakspeare students, we welcome eagerly the new volume of Dr. H. Furness's Variorum edition—the eighth, containing "As You Like It." He has done his work at it with more zest, we think, than in any of his previous volumes. Rosalind has charmed him. And, though he has fleeted his time carefully, instead of carelessly, he has lived in the golden world of the heroine's bright smiles; and he tells us it is all "as I like it, and as you like it too." This book is a pleasant message from over sea from one of our kin, an honoured worker for many years past at our great poet, and fully sustains the American selector's and critic's reputation. May he live long to edit every play of Shakspeare's in like style! The failure of the Germans to understand and appreciate Rosalind makes Dr. Furness specially insist on the Englishness of her, and of the whole play; and he humorously proposes to students of anthropology one of Shakspeare's comedies "as the supreme and final test in determining nationality, at least as between the Gallic, the Teutonic, and the Anglo-Saxon races." But though George Sand's fascination by Jacques is unaccountable, surely the elder Théophile Gautier's fascination by Rosalind, in Made-moiselle de Maupin, would satisfy even Dr. Furness; but he has evidently never heard of it. For the sources of the plot, he has reprinted much of "Gamelyn," and all Lodge's "Rosalynde"; he gives a full sketch of George Sand's "Comme il vous plaira," discusses the duration of the action, and the costume, gives a list of the music—using the New Shakspeare Society's list, &c.—and a good selection of notes and criticisms.

Correction.—Mr. John Taylor writes to complain that his paper on "Lear," read before the Clifton Shakspeare Society, was misreported in the ACADEMY of last week (p. 272). It was Kent, and not the poet himself, whom he said deserved the treatment of the stocks.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

THE next number of Hermathena, to be published on May 1, will contain reviews of Owen's "Tristia," by Dr. Robinson Ellis; of Verrall's "Agamemnon" and Tucker's "Supplikes," by Prof. Tyrrell; and of Ellis's "Commentary on Catullus," by Mr. Starkie. There will also be articles and reviews by Profs. Gwynn, Mahaffy, Abbott, Palmer, and by Dr. Quarry, Mr. Purser, and Mr. Bury.

AMONG the articles in the May number of Education will be a strong plea for German versus Latin, by Mr. H. W. Eve, Head Master of London University College School; an article on "Cambridge," with several illustrations; and an interview with Dr. Richard Wormell, to whom the cause of higher commercial education is so much indebted, accompanied by a full-page portrait.

AMONG the illustrations in the next number of the Art Review will be reproductions of Fritz von Uhde's "Grace" and "Sermon on the Mount"; also of Alfred East's "Kioto," "Fujiama," and "Lake Biwa." Miss Elizabeth Craigmyle contributes a poem entitled "Our Lady of Melancholia"; Mr. Frederick Wedmore a review of Mr. Sharp's recent Browning; Miss Helen Zimmern an article on Antonio Fogazzaro; and Mr. H. S. Salt an article on Thoreau's Poetry. Among the other contributions are "Heine on Music"; "Montpellier," by Mrs. Anna Geddes; and "The Portraits of Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans," by Mrs. Henry Ady.

THE May number of Time will contain articles on "The Greater Brotherhood," by Mr. Felix Moscheles; "Irish Wit and Humour," by Mr. O'Connor Power; "Courage," by Mr. Bar; and the conclusion of Mr. Engel's paper on the "Foreign Policy of Russian Teardom."

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will shortly issue an English edition, under the charge of a London editor, of Ar interchange, an American fortnightly magazine which was founded in 1878.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

FULL term began at Cambridge last week; at Oxford it will begin to-day.

PROF. MAX MÜLLER has been re-elected Gifford lecturer at Glasgow for a second term of two years. At St. Andrews, Prof. Edward Caird, of Glasgow, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Andrew Lang.

THE university of Heidelberg has conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Theology on Prof. Robertson Smith, in recognition of his distinguished services to the early history of religion.

ARCHDEACON FARRAR has been appointed Lady Margaret's preacher at Cambridge for the ensuing year.

THE general board of studies at Cambridge recommend that the readership in Talmudic, vacant by the death of Dr. Schiller-Szinessy, be suppressed; that the sum of £200 a year be added to the stipend assigned to Prof. Bensley, so long as he lectures for three terms in each year on Aramaic; and that £100 per annum be devoted to the teaching of Talmudic. For the present term, Mr. Lowe is continuing some of Dr. Schiller-Szinessy's lectures.

PROF. J. W. HALES, Clark Lecturer in English Literature at Trinity College, Cambridge, proposes to deliver a course of six lectures during the present term on "Shakespeare's Tragedies."

MR. J. Y. BUCHANAN, the university lecturer in geography at Cambridge, is lecturing this term on "Oceanography."

THE annual report of Manchester New College, the hundred and fourth since the foundation in 1786, is of special interest as being the first since the removal to Oxford, where it is now temporarily established at 90 High Street, in the rooms vacated by Mansfield College. A site for a permanent building has been purchased; and Mr. S. B. Worthington, of Manchester, a member of the committee, has drawn up plans. It is estimated that the total expenditure required will be £49,000, towards which donations of nearly £33,000 have already been promised. During the past year the library has received two valuable additions—about one thousand books collected by the late Dr. Charles Beard for his special studies on the history of the Reformation in Germany and of Port Royal; and one half of the library of University Hall, mainly consisting of general literature.

THE Rev. Richard F. Clarke, S.J., formerly of St. John's College, Oxford, has published a pamphlet on University Education in Ireland (Longmans), which may fairly be taken to represent the views of the Catholic hierarchy. What is asked for is the establishment of a Catholic university college in Dublin, by the side of Trinity College; and of a similar Presbyterian college at Belfast. At each of these, as also at Trinity, there should be a conscience clause; and no public money should be applied to the endowment of any theological professorship.

THE Barlow Lectures on Dante at University College, London, will be delivered this year by Prof. A. Farinelli on Tuesdays and Fridays during May and June at 3 p.m. The lectures, which are free to the public, will be delivered in Italian. The inaugural lecture, on May 2, will be devoted to "The Life and Times of Dante."

THE council of Owen's College, Manchester, invite applications for the post of Cobden lecturer in political economy. The stipend will be £150 per annum, together with a share of fees.

The corporation of Harvard University has authorised the publication of two monographs which it is hoped may form the beginning of a series. The first will be A History of the Veto Power in the United States, by Edward Campbell Mason, instructor in political economy. The second will be An Introduction to the Study of Federal Governments, by Albert Bushnell Hart, assistant professor of history. This will contain an historical introduction, with brief sketches of the rise and institutions of the principal federal governments which have existed from the establishment of the Greek federations to the present day. To each sketch will be appended a brief critical bibliography. Then will follow a parallel arrangement of the texts, in English, of the four most important federal constitutions—those of Canada, Germany, Switzerland, and the United States. There will be an appendix containing a list of special authorities on federal government, and of references to discussions in more general works. These monographs will be published in England by Mr. Edward Arnold.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

ON THE TOMB OPENED IN CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL, MARCH 7, 1890.

WITHIN a pillared tomb beneath the roof
Of England's greatest church, a Prelate's bones
For full six hundred years have lain aloof
From all a restless people's shouts and groans,
And busy life that still our nation owns.
Behold! the lid is lifted; look and say
Whose be the ring, the crozier dight with stones?
Whose be the brocaded stole? the rich array
That clings in faded pomp around this mouldering clay?

Oh, tell us, England's scholars, if ye can,
Is this the courtly HUBERT's mitred head?
Or is it his who won the rights of man
With England's Barons from a tyrant dread,
And made our homes our castles? Hast thou read
The glorious tale? Then by these relics kneel, And thank kind Heaven that STEPHEN LANGTON led
Our noble sires to found the people's weal
Deep on the solid rock—a tower of triple steel.

The rock of equal justice, equal law,
Where Britain's power is rooted, whence her fame,
Up-springing through the ages, fills with awe
Full many a vassal-realm of older name;
And savage islands yet the seed may claim Dropped from this hand. Oh, power of steadfast will!

Oh, might of daring! which through blood and flame
Could nerve this once warm heart to cope with ill—
Gifts of a bounteous God, be with our country still!

Lay, lay his cold limbs to their rest once more;
Bid busy pencil trace each fading line
Of robe and chalice; call out curious lore
To read aright each jewel's graven sign.
But see ye lose not what is more divine!
Ye cannot shut it in the tomb—'twill spread,
A part of England's common air; no shrine
Can hold the love of Truth, whose royal tread Makes waste worlds bloom with life, and fain would wake the dead.

AGNES S. LEWIS.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Jewish Quarterly Review opens with a valuable article by Prof. Freudenthal on the supposed traces of Greek philosophy in the Septuagint. The discussion of words like ψυχή, φρόνησις, &c., leads to a decided answer in the negative. Dr. Kohut seeks to show, by a simple juxtaposition of passages, that the primitive legends of the Avesta and the Bundash are based upon Gen. i.-xi. Mrs. von Glehn and Mr. Jacobs treat of Browning as a religious teacher. Prof. Graetz eloquently traces the present significance of Judaism. Mrs. H. Lucas interestingly describes a Jewish mother's views of religious education. Prof. D. Kaufmann gives an account of Don Joseph Nasi, founder of colonies in the Holy Land and of the community of Cori in the Campagna, and adds from original documents fresh material for the history of the Venetian Jews. Mr. Montefiore takes a survey of Kuenen's Onderzoek—a serious task of which the writer acquits himself with equal modesty and thoroughness. Dr. Neubauer and Mr. Jacobs have a friendly discussion on English Massorites, and Mr. Simmons gives the Arabic text of Maimon's Letter of Consolation, which he has already translated.

THE April Livre Moderne opens with a collection of notes on "Bibliophiles et Bibliopoles," some of which are not destitute of a certain combativeness. Let us trust that M. Uzan will not allow that peace of books which passeth all praise to be often broken by asperities of the kind. Amends are made indeed by some delightful sketches of Monselet's inserted in a later article, but on the whole the number is a little "thin."

CORRESPONDENCE.

IRISH ITEMS.

London: April 21, 1890.

In the recently published *Irish Life of S. Senanus a sea monster is described at length, and among the details we find (l. 2226):

ro fuchad didiu in fairros ar mhi a brotha cou ar a neimhni in tan no oingadh innte. niontfaile eithra ni tirmat uaithe e sin anall neoh atfessed a seola, i.e., "then the sea boiled from the greatness of its heat and from its virulence when it (1) entered it. No boats could (2) catch it: neither from that day to this has anyone escaped from it (3) who could tell tidings of it."†

For the words italicised read (1) 'progressed therein [rushed through it],' (2) 'get at it,' (3) 'to tell [qui narraret],' and you have the easy, obvious, and only possible interpretation. The Corrigenda, however (p. 410, col. 1) exhibit:

"P. 214, ll. 2, 3, 'No boats (eithra) could catch it.' For this rendering I am indebted to Mr. S. H. O'Grady; but the nom. pl. of eithra (gl. stlata) is eithir, H. 2. 16, col. 391, and I suspect that the true translation is 'No birds could catch it' eithra being, perhaps = W. adar, and cogn. with Skr. patra, Eng. feather."

Quintilian says: quidam non dubitaverunt etymologas subficere omnem nominis causam. But here the process is not applied uniformly: it is even more needed in demhna nom. pl. (ll. 3654-55-58-67), gen. pl. (l. 3644), acc. pl. (ll. 2778, 3723) of demhan, 'demon,' which in the spoken language makes the formally correct nom. pl. demhain, gen. pl. c. art. na ndemhan, into which latter also the editor rightly expands na ndem (ll. 3635-40); in the two forms gabann [MS. gabann] and gobha nom. s. (l. 3782); in piasda for gen. s. whether of piasda or of piasda (l. 2211); in laeigh for laegha, acc. pl. of laegh, 'calf.' These all, with many other forthcoming cases in point, are matters of use and wont rather than of strict 'formenlehre,' and to be judged in view of the old precept: aliud est latine aliud grammatices loqui. Besides, as matter of practice where had been the poor fellows who gave chase and never came back: in a boat, think you, or on board a bird?

But to our monster (ll. 2217 sqq.):

airter eich li . . . da choie ugrana imrebra fithhe [i]ar nairter . . . eithre muirmhil fuirre iar nairter, i.e., "a horse's mane had it . . . two very hideous very thick feet under it; behind it a mane . . . a whale's tail upon it behind."

In the ind. verb. is:

"airter mane? forelock?"

It means 'forelock,' in the same degree as the 'façade' of your house = the knocker on the street-door, or any highly complex whole = one of its parts. Airther, oirther, means 'front,' 'forepart': airther and iartar of a house = 'the but and the ben,' therefore render here: 'it had a horse's forehead . . . [and] belonging to [said] forehead, two right ugly thick legs supported it [the beast] . . . in respect of the hinder part it [the beast] was garnished with a whale's extremity'—desinis in piacem generose superne caballe, Flaccus would have exclaimed at sight.

In one of two quatrains of benediction by Patrick uttered for Kinel-Owen (afterwards 'the O'Neills of the North') the right reading of l. 365 is: cen sluag bhfer bhfaíl dia magin, which in the printed versions (cf. Ir. Hom.,

p. 40, Vit. Pat., p. 480), based on faulty texts, appears as:

"the hosts of the men of Fál to their place . . to them on every hill"; and so the editor has it here. Render the whole quatrain:

'so long as fields shall be under crops their [Kinel-Owen's] battalions shall [prevail] over other men: without the men of Ireland's [penetrating] to their [Kinel-Owen's] precinct, while these shall assault all other [men's] hills whatsoever.'

The phrase 'Men of Ireland' opposed to a particular tribe or locality has the same force as 'All England against Surrey' and so forth.

L. 799:

ateonnus dano a ben imthasi aisingi, i.e., "more-over her . . woman beheld a vision."

In ind. verb. is:

"ben imtha glosses pellex in Sg. 68 b 9. . . The imtha is probably cognate with imda, 'bedroom,' 'bed,' so ben imtha may mean chamberwoman. Hence imthach, 'adulterous,' SRann 3175."

The legend tells that Columbkille's father was Felim, son of Fergus, but as to Felim's ethios is silent; they were patriarchal, likely. At all events, ben imtha as it stands means pellex and nought else, as thus: iomadh = inúth 'jealousy,' and iomtha [a gen. = inútha] iomthach [adj.] = inúthach 'jealous,' lucht iomtha = lucht inútha 'gens invidiæ,' 'invidi,' 'invidiosi' (O'Cl. gl.), cf. nocha lémhthar hé re hio-madh mógénar iomadh nar gein, 'none shall dare by way of envy to meddle with him, happy the spot in which he's born' (prophetic quatrain in Vit. Molaisi, Add. 18,205, f. 7b), and iomtha re taobh do thire lucht iomtha is eithhe, 'along thy country's marches many are they that be thine enviers [ill-wishers]' (the Highland poet Cathal M'Vurich addressing Colla Mac Donald, Milton's 'Colkitto': autograph in H. 3. 18, T. C. D.). Now the pellex, if not herself jealous, has in all ages been a cause of jealousy in others: hence ben iomtha 'mulier invidiæ.'

Ll. 2025-27-93-96, 4310:

"fó a choim, i.e., 'under his protection,' 'under his keeping'";

in each case to the ruination of the incident's point, which lies not in custody, but in absolute concealment. Render throughout 'hidden in or under his [thy, etc.] clothes': not that coim per se means a 'suit of clothes,' cf. ba coim m'ria gciath dósomh, 'it was a shelter before a shower to him' (iv. M. vi., p. 2140).

L. 2402:

cuill [gen. of coll, 'hazel'], i.e., "of holly," is a slip of the pen doubtless; but cuillenn, cuillend 'holly,' is a tree of much virtue in Irish lore, and Dr. Zimmer pricked his fingers badly when he grasped it in the famous Kuhn's Zschr. article and split the gen. cuillind into cúil ind with an ingenious meaning of his own.

siridh edin [accus.] in maighi, i.e., "he searches the . . . of the plain."

Say: 'he searches out the smooth part [i.e., the choicest where he desired to grab land] of the plain,' cf. caoinedh phráis, 'plates of brass,' and ar chaoin na gclár sin ro ghrean sé, 'on the plates of the ledge he graved' (l. Kings, vii. 30, 36); taobh esgeacoi: a chlóca, 'the rough [seamy] side of his cloak,' a agéith 'of his shield' [showing the wickerwork], to exhibit which was a hostile sign.

L. 3565:

tíit a aonar i Sliabh nDaidehe, i.e., "he goes alone to Sliabh Daidehe," where the editor gives us a nomen loci. In notes, p. 351:

"3565. Perhaps daidehe is another form of the adverb dadaig; if so, translate: 'he goes alone to a mountain at night.'"

In corrigenda to text, p. 410, col. 2:

"P. 252, l. 26, for 'to Sliabh Daidehe,' read 'early to a mountain.'"

In ind. verb., p. 389, col. 2:

"daidehe, 'at night' = d'aidhe, as dadaig = d'adaig."

In corrigenda to notes and indexes, p. 411, col. 2:

"P. 389, ll. 2, 3, read daidehe early, 3565 = daidehe (Táin bó Dartada, p. 190, l. 30 [where it is left untranslated]), cf. daiche = moiche, 'soonness,' 'earliness,' P. O'O."

Render 'he went upon a mountain by night,' where daidehe is the everyday d'oidhche, i.e., 'de nocte' = noctu; whereas daiche is nom. abstr. from daich, O'Clery's daith = ésgaid 'ready,' tapaidh 'smart,' luath 'swift,' cf. gilla daith ba garb re goil ro caith a arm re héchtobh, 'a smart lad that was rough in fight and plied his weapons in slaughtering' (Fig. 90, f. 17, col. 1), mina fagar cabair ndaith sgarfat re éinn mbithaith, 'unless that I get speedy [early] help I shall have done with Ireland the so excellent' (Death of Finn: Fig. 1782). With daich daith cf. deich deith, teichim teithim, maich maith, brách bráth, crích crích, &c.

adnaistium in gobann iir tonnuibh in mara, con rochtain cu talmain, is, con búrghí ar uachtar sháile, con chummeugad annu no ill, achi amal bidh [budh] a talmain no beth, i.e., "so, without reaching the land, they bury the smith amongst the waves of the sea, down, without rising to the top of the brine, without moving hither or thither, but as it were on land."

S. Brendan's smith dies and is buried at sea—abolish all commas in the passage and render:

'they bury the smith amongst the waves of the sea without [his] reaching the earth [bottom] downwards, without [his] rising upon the surface of the brine [upwards], but as though [i.e., any more than though] it had been on land he were.'

The body was held in equilibrium at a depth corresponding to a grave on shore, and as firmly as though embedded in clay.

L. 3809: dia do betha, a brenainn sunn, i.e., "God thy life, O Brenainn, here."

S. Brendan comes to an island of one aged tenant. The old man is friendly, and greets the saint with the warmest term of welcome that the language affords: one that is in the mouth of every Irish speaker. Render 'all hail to thee, Brendan, here [hither]'. The words are those of fáilte an aingil 'the Angelic Salutation,' or 'Hail Mary': dia do bheitha a Mhuire lán do ghráda. Had the old man been hostile, he would have said: nárab é do bheithasa chugainn, 'never welcome you to us,' as the people say in English (1st p. pl. for sing., didactically).

L. 3923: im comhlud na díshere, i.e., "as to the . . . of charity."

Read im comhallad and render 'concerning the exercise [fulfilment] of charity,' cf. um comhallad na derce and ro comuill (l. 3940). An affair of pronunciation simply; the difficulty is analogous to that which might arise from finding 'praps' written for 'perhaps.'

L. 3942: in ceibhteoir, i.e., "the wonderworker."

But the fem. art. shows that here is no personal n. masc. and O'Davoren writes aibell teoir (Fig. 88, fo. 80b, col. 1, l. 17), where aibell is n. fem. and teoir a dep. gen., meaning together scintilla theoricæ vitæ.

Much else there is to notice, and the foregoing might be largely developed and furnished forth with further 'belegstellen'; but suffice it to add that MacCarthy Riach's scribe was Angus O'Callannan, not O'Callaid, as the editor expands O'Call- (is there such a name?), and that his stair na lombardach is a précis of the Life of Pelagius in the Legenda Aurea (largely

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN DANTE AND BEATRICE.

16, Montagu-street, Portman-square:
April 19, 1890.

When your correspondent (ante, p. 253) attacked in Notes and Queries my article there on the above subject, I contented myself with answering his argument courteously, as between fellow contributors to that, in some sense, co-operative organ. But when he carries the war into another field, and (quoting me rather loosely) attacks me in the ACADEMY for what I had said in Notes and Queries, I do not feel bound by the same forbearance. If attacks abound, refutation doth much more abound; and I no longer hesitate to point out roundly that the fantastic theory—the strano parera, as Moreni calls it—of Canon Biscioni that the Vita Nuova may be treated as an allegory which he endeavours to set on its feet again has long ago been laid to rest by all the best commentators of the Vita, English, American, German, French, and, above all, Italian. The gratuitous introduction of unnecessary elements of difficulty by Dante commentators was aptly described by an Italian writer more than three centuries ago as a determination to stir up mud in clear water (quel che è chiaro intorbidare).

One would think no more need be said. And yet some who are not intimately acquainted with the Vita Nuova in itself, in its glosses, and in its history, may be led away by the speciousness of a fanciful theory. If this is the case with anyone, I would say "read the Vita Nuova for yourself." The Commedia is full of difficult passages in every canto. But the Vita is limpid as the Gospel narrative; and no one who had not lost himself in the splendid mazes of the Commedia, like your learned correspondent, would ever think of finding an allegory in it.

The whole theory of Biscioni rests on an inverted pyramid. He begins at the wrong end, or, in folklore language, tries "to jump in at the garret window instead of walking upstairs." It has been a very common practice, but a very bad one, to start at once in making acquaintance with Dante's works by dipping into the Divina Commedia—though this may suffice for those who only want to talk about him. But to make acquaintance with such an author as Dante—who was creating a language of the emotions as well as a language of the lips as he went along, and at the same time developing step by step the art of poetry—it is necessary to begin where he began, and trace his whole road—from the threshold of shrinking youth to the attainment of perfected manhood on the steps of the throne of God.

It is utterly impossible for any one who begins with the Vita Nuova (where Dante himself began) to fall into Biscioni's mistake. The story there unfolded, telling how youth and maiden met, and how the dormant fire of his extraordinary intellect was electrified into vitality by the lightning of Beatrice Portinari's smile, is laid out before us step by step. Some would like Dante to have been attracted by a more noisy, showy female; but for the best of us it is just in Beatrice's reticence that appears her transcendent merit—her surpassing feminineness: in quietness and confidence shall be your strength. Every time he meets her again, every time he thinks of her in solitude, her smile is crystallised by the alembic of his mind into a sonnet which has developed into a model of love verses for the world. As you have given my opponent's paraphrase of "The Sonnet of Sonnets," I must ask you to give my literal version of the same:

So gracious and discreet my fair is seen,
That when her head in courtesy is bent
The flame of every forward word is spent,
Extinguished every rapturous glance too keen!
She threads her way through incense-clouds of praise;
Meekness so guileless in her aspect blent,
She seems a thing of grace from Heaven lent,
A miracle for theme of mortals' lays.
Such pleasures in her* longing eyes admire,
That dear delight the heart is taught to prove,
Delight known but to him it penetrates.
While from her lips he thinks there emanates
A spirit debonnaire and full of love,
E'er whispering to his anxious soul, "Suspire!"

It will be better still if your readers will take the trouble of making themselves masters of the original; but either way it is absolutely impossible for any one to look at the picture of the Florence street-scene, which that sonnet at once paints on the mind, and imagine for a moment that Dante was talking about theology. All the rest is equally graphic. The way in which, not to compromise her, he made seeming love to another donna as a difesa; his conversations with other women about her; the way in which he lingered ever in her neighbourhood to feed his eyes with the sight of her—all is told in the trembling strain of the youthful adorer. Such hesitation and delicacy are quite consonant with our personal acquaintance with human affections; but if Dante only meant to speak of studying theology, such reticence would become simply ludicrous: there was nothing to prevent his devoting himself to such studies to the top of his bent. Then comes, in his manlier age, his participation in Beatrice's personal sorrows; the description of the death of her father, the customs of Florence as to the manner of mourning the dead. The preface follows, that death may similarly visit his own loved one. The terror this gives him. Then that preface realised. The details of the house of mourning. His converse with her brother. The constancy of his love for her afterwards. His continual weeping for her becoming the occasion for the aberration of accepting consolation from Emma Donati's proffered sympathy. His nevertheless uninterrupted dwelling on the memory of Beatrice, till he grows so wrapt in contemplation of her that he lives more in thought with her than in fact with his fellows on earth, and this culminates in the idea of consolation which comes to him of writing of her "more worthily" in her glorified state. And "thus," just as the sight of her on earth had inspired his matchless sonnets, so the glimpse of her in bliss inspired the Commedia.

All these sonnets and prose confidences of his love were collected, to be poured into the bosom of his friend of friends, who knew and was witness to all the details of it, and who himself addressed him in a sonnet in which he has caught something of Dante's own mind, telling him to dwell less on the fair form lost and more on the beatified spirit ever-present above.

*As it may be captiously contended that in this line I have departed from literalness, I beg to point out that each sonnet is preceded by a preamble, which is part of its concrete form, and I have made a point here of introducing an exquisite expression literally from the preamble, which, in the version, ante p. 254, is paraphrased:

"She was of so noble a presence, so abounding in every charm." . . .

There is nothing the least like the study of theology in all this; but his continual dwelling on her, through all the years widowed of the sight of her, in his memory, undoubtedly led him to that elevated and idealised view of her which gave us the Commedia as a setting in which to praise his priceless jewel of womanhood as other was praised never (quello che mai non fu detto d'alcuna).

The cycle of Dante's love, begun and expanded in the Vita, is completed in the Commedia. In the four last cantos of the Purgatorio he says distinctly that he meets Beatrice again "after ten years' thirst." She reproaches him for putting another woman in her place; then finally comes their reconciliation after his penitence at her feet, which, for the moral of the story, had to take place before he could display his final apotheosis of her in the Paradiso.

If all this be mere allegory, then every history and every love story and every love poem that ever was written is an allegory.* Indeed, there are places in which he specially emphasizes the fact that it is not an allegory—e.g., where by a beautiful hyperbole he says that she is "longed for (desiata) in the highest heaven." If she were Divine Wisdom, her place would antecedently of right be there." Again, where he writes: "Love muses of her—'How can any mortal thing possibly be so pure and so adorned?' Then he looks on her again, and says to himself—'I swear God has designed to make in her a new thing.' And, again, 'She is the most perfect work of nature.'" All this is purely human.

The notion that the maidens whom Dante celebrates as companions of his Beatrice are mere personifications of moral qualities is surely a more transparent distortion of the truth than all the rest. For all Dante's love sonnets are not bound up in the Vita Nuova. I need but quote the joyous ditty beginning: "Guido, vorrei che tu e Lapo ed io," where the same Giovanna is mentioned by name, with the pretty wish that some good magician would transport him and his two friends, each with his mistress ("Monna Bice" being named as his own), on to the high seas in a boat, where every wind should be at the command of their own will; floating on ever and ever; the joy of being together ever increasing from the increased indulgence of it, and speaking never of anything but their loves; "each of the girls being as happy with us as I am persuaded we should be with them." This does not read much like a description of theological studies, but is as pretty a love-conceit as poet ever put on paper.

Finally, the sweeping allusion to "the older commentators, Benvenuto da Imola," &c., with the implication that they read the Vita Nuova as he reads it, is disingenuous. The Vita Nuova, on the contrary, was so entirely accepted as a mere "story of youthful love" that the older commentators never gave it the attention it deserved. They met Beatrice in the full blaze of Dante's highest idealisation of her, and all they had to do was to treat her under that final appearance; and yet they mostly do say, "this is that Beatrice whom as a youth he loved."

The greatest stumbling-stock of all, however, is one to which your correspondent naturally makes no allusion; and that is the corroborative historical testimony in support of the Vita Nuova. Now this is certainly not abundant, though it is quite sufficient of itself to put out Canon

*The elder Rossetti, in making out his system of what Fraticelli calls gergo settario—an allegory with a political in place of a theological purpose—was actually driven by his honest consistency to the more extravagant form of this dilemma, to the extent of treating the mistresses of Cavalcanti, Oino, Petrarca, and even Boccaccio, as allegorical persons.

Bisclioni's candle. As I have gone into this at considerable length in a paper for the Royal Archaeological Institute (read April 17), as well as in my "Reply" in Notes and Queries (April 12), I will not repeat anything of it here but one item of such importance that it fully justifies me in occupying your space with a brief reference. It would seem, then, that England has long housed in the Ashburnham Library a codex of the Commentary on the Commedia by Dante's son, but no one had ever published any account of it. This codex, at the sale, found its way to the Public Library at Florence; and here it was deciphered by an indefatigable Dantista, originally inclined towards Bisclioni's theory or something like it. He found it, however, to be an entirely re-written version of this Commentary, with the original passage concerning the historical character of Beatrice worded in much plainer terms, as if the possible misunderstanding of later years had been foreseen and specially provided against. As I have already given full particulars of it, I need say no more here. Supposing that the fact of its being the actual handwriting of Pietro di Dante should be disproved, there is evidence enough that it must still be of a date so early that it is scarcely less valuable. While, on the other hand, if it is confirmed that it is his, we need never be disturbed again by this historical doubt as to Dante's mistress.

In conclusion, I should like to find place for a quotation from what Mazzini has written on the subject—Mazzini who, arch-conspirator as he was, yet refused to accept the allegorical theory of the elder Rossetti, however much it favoured his political designs. He calls the Vita Nuova

"the perfume of Dante's early years. The dream of that love which God sends to His privileged children in order that they may never forget the immortality of their being. . . . The Vita Nuova, in which he relates the emotions of his love for Beatrice, is an inimitable little book of gentleness, purity, delicacy; of sweet and sad thoughts; loving as the note of the dove, ethereal as the perfume of flowers; and that pen which in later years resembled a sword in his hand, here delineates them as tenderly as Raffaele might have done with the pencil. . . . There are sonnets far beyond the most admired of Petrarch's, almost untranslatable, so exquisite are they in their construction, so purely Italian in their harmony. Shelley alone could have succeeded. We think that the task of translating the Vita Nuova can only be confided to the soul of a woman. . . . One cannot really understand how men like Bisclioni and (the elder) Rossetti can have argued against Beatrice's real existence; or how any one can make out two Beatrices—that of the poet and that of the theologian. It would destroy the progressive continuity, the peculiar genius in the love of Dante. It is precisely this endeavour to place a link between the real and the ideal, . . . between earth and heaven, which converts the love of Dante into . . . a work of purification and idealisation, which stands by itself, pointing out the mission of woman and of love. She who inspired Dante here below became his angel, his guiding angel, in heaven. Death disappeared before the mighty love which kindled the heart of the poet. . . ."

"His union with Gemma Donati . . . appears to have been calm and cold, rather the accomplishment of a social duty than the result of an impulse of the heart. . . . Above is the serene heaven, and in it the image of Beatrice immovable, and shining like the sun of his inner life. . . . He inspired himself by her memory, not only in the magnificent pages which he consecrated to her towards the close of his life in the Commedia, but in his worship for WOMAN, which pervades it from one end to the other. In his love for the beautiful, in his stirrings after inward purity, Beatrice was the muse of his understanding, the angel of his soul, the consoling spirit which sustained him in exile, in poverty, under a cheerless, wandering, denuded existence, if ever there was one. . . ."

Such is the ideal of womanhood which the Florence committee is intending most opportunely to put forward at its May festival.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "TEUTON."

London: April 19, 1890.

So far as I know, the unanimous opinion of philologists of authority has hitherto been that the ethnic name Teutones is a derivative of "peudā," "people," from which in later times the adjective Theotiscus (Deutsch, Dutch) has been formed. It is perhaps presumptuous to question a derivation which has been supported by so many scholars of the first rank; but it certainly seems to me that this derivation is open to strong objection, and that there is a possible alternative, which is on all grounds preferable.

There is reason to believe that both Grimm's Law and Verner's Law were already in operation at the time when the name of the Teutones became known to the civilised world. Hence, if the name were a derivative of "peudā" <teutā>, we should expect that its Latin form would have been Teudones. The difficulty is generally met by the assumption that the recorded form is due to "Celtic sound-substitution"; but of this there is no evidence. The formation of an on-stem in the circumstances supposed seems, moreover, not to be quite in accordance with analogy. Prof. Rhys, indeed, has suggested that the word (which is found also as Teutons) is not an on-stem, but is to be restored as "peudānōs," "kings"; but this supposition involves obvious difficulties.

The suggestion that I have to offer is that Teutones is a derivative of the adjective "teuto-" <teuto- = Gothic teuts, "good." This hypothesis has the advantage of explaining the Roman form by means of Latin sound-substitution alone; and the development of the on-stem is in this case perfectly analogous. That a nation may have called themselves "the good" is, surely, not very unlikely. The particular kind of "goodness" on which the Teutons prided themselves would probably be warlike prowess.

If this hypothesis be accepted, it takes away the last scrap of excuse for our perverse English practice of using the word "Teutonic" instead of "Germanic." It is, of course, true that classically-inclined mediæval chroniclers used Teutonicus in the sense of Theotiscus, just as they said Dacti for "Danes"; but no one will say that this affected custom is any justification of our English usage, if the etymological notion which it implies be unsound.

NOT AN AMERICAN.

London: April 22, 1890.

SIR,—In the kind notice of my book, A Tour in a Phædon (ACADEMY, April 19), your reviewer has made a slight mistake in calling me an American. Pray allow me to state that I am an Englishman—a fact, I think, made sufficiently clear in the very first chapter. Strangely enough, another critic writes: "The author, who is an Englishman to the core," &c., &c.

Catalogue of the Persian, Turkish, Hindustani, and Pushtu Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library. Begun by Prof. Ed. Sachau, continued, completed, and edited by Hermann Ethé. Part I.—"The Persian Manuscripts." (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

THE Catalogue of the Persian MSS. in the Bodleian, pushed forwards, as Dr. Ethé informs us in his preface, so as to be ready for the eighth Oriental Congress held last September in Stockholm and Christiania, is now before us, and those who are interested in this branch of literature are at length enabled to appreciate the immense riches stored up in the library in question. It is scarcely necessary to mention the manifold associations of Oxford with Oriental—especially with Persian—studies. It was Thomas Hyde, the Oxford professor (not to go further back than the year 1700), who "made the first systematic attempt to restore the history of the old Persian religion" in his celebrated work entitled Veterum Persarum, et Parthorum, et Medorum Religionis Historia. It was to the Bodleian Library that the first MS. of the Vendidad that Sadé brought to Europe was presented in the year 1723. It was the sight of a facsimile of four pages of this precious MS. (No. 1935 in the Catalogue), sent to Etienne Fourmont in Paris, which first awoke in the impetuous soul of the gallant young Frenchman, Anquetil du Perron, the resolution to win for his country the glory of bestowing on Europe a knowledge of the contents of the sacred books of the Zoroastrians. And it was the desire of inspecting the treasures contained in the Bodleian Library which made him refuse to quit England, at the termination of the captivity wherein his seven years of adventure, endeavour, and final success had culminated, until he had been permitted to pay a visit to Oxford. "Je déclarai net," he writes, "que je ne quitterois pas l'Angleterre, sans avoir vu Oxford, puisqu'on m'y avoit retenu prisonnier contre le droit des gens."

Space does not permit us to enlarge on this topic, or to do more than mention one or two of the private collections which have gone to enrich the Bodleian. Indeed, Dr. Ethé promises a full account of these in the introduction to the second volume of the Catalogue, which will also contain, besides the description of the Turkish, Hindûstânî, and Pushtû MSS., the various indices necessary to facilitate the use of the present volume. That these indices are deferred is certainly a matter for regret; yet the admirable arrangement of the 2038 MSS. described according to their subject-matter and chronological sequence, together with the short, but lucid, table of contents prefixed to the work, renders their absence a matter of less consequence than one might suppose.

That the work commenced by Prof. Sachau and completed by Dr. Ethé was well worth the doing, everyone aware of the extent of the Bodleian collection of Persian MSS., and the exceptional value of some of the private collections embodied therein, was fully prepared to admit. Among the latter, those of Sir Gore Ouseley and Sir William Ouseley deserve especial notice. The remarkable care exercised by the first of these justly celebrated Orientalists in the choice of MSS. is illustrated by a remark in one of his letters to his brother. Speaking of the large number of worthless and inaccurate MSS. current in India, he says, "I only buy those written in Irân, which are very scarce, or else have copies taken in fair Nastalîk from the best originals under my own inspection." To the nucleus thus formed in India he was enabled to add a large number of genuine Persian MSS., collected under exceptionally favourable circumstances during his mission to the court of Fath Ali Shâh. Several of these were given to him by the king, by ministers and noblemen attached to the court, or by the authors themselves. Among these we will only notice No. 520, an epic poem in the style of the Shâhnâma composed by the then poet-laureate in praise of Fath Ali Shâh; and No. 1200, the poems of Mirzâ Abdu'l-Wahhâb, then minister for foreign affairs, who wrote under the nom-de-guerre of Nashât. The first of these was presented to Sir Gore Ouseley by the king; the second by the statesman-bard, who, amid the cares of office, found leisure to pursue the gentler paths of literature. These MSS., and others of the same class, are interesting from their associations; but there are others which, either by reason of their age, authenticity, or rarity, are far more precious, and of which, indeed, the value is almost inestimable. It is in the sections devoted to poetry and biography that some of the most remarkable of these are to be found. Among them we can only pause to notice a MS. of the Masnavî, dated A.H. 805 (A.D. 1402-1403); a MS. of Nizâmî's five great poems, dated A.H. 767 (A.D. 1365); a MS. of the Divân of Hâfiz, dated A.H. 843 (A.D. 1439), only fifty-two years after the author's death; a copy of Jâmi's first Divân, dated A.H. 899 (A.D. 1494), only one year after the author's death; another Masnavî, truly described as "one of the most valuable that we possess," since it has undergone careful collation with, and correction from, a vast number of very old and authentic MSS.; and several very rare biographies of poets, at least one of which (No. 395 in the Catalogue) appears to be quite unique in Europe. Among the historical works also are several of exceptional value—as, for instance, the original autograph of Sharaf Khân's great work on the History of the Kurds, of which the text has been edited in Russia. We would gladly stop to describe a number of other MSS. scarcely inferior in point of interest to those already noticed; but we must of necessity pass on to other points which demand notice. Moreover, a good Catalogue is already the epitome and essence of a library, and one cannot subject this essence to further condensation. Scarcely a page of the work under consideration is uninteresting or unprofitable reading. All that we can do is to select certain points which have especially struck us as a specimen of the whole, referring those who desire fuller information to the Catalogue itself. To quote from the preface of the Masnavî: "a little is an index to much, a single draught indicates a reservoir, and a handful may serve as a sample of a mighty granary."

That the compilation of a Catalogue such as we are discussing is of all literary labours the most arduous will scarcely be denied by anyone who has had occasion to examine and describe even a hundred or two of Oriental MSS. In any case it requires patience, diligence, scholarship, and judgment in a high degree; for in all large collections of this sort—and the Bodleian collection is no exception to the general rule—many MSS. occur which are not only without title, without date, and without obvious indication of authorship, but in which the pagination is hopelessly disordered, or the writing execrably illegible. To rearrange, describe, and identify such, to traverse with labour and pain their inky labyrinths in search of some clue which may lead to a discovery of their authorship, and to consider attentively page by page the character of their handwriting, with a view to fixing as nearly as possible the date of their transcription, is no light task, and often taxes to the uttermost the resources of the most accomplished scholar. Small wonder is it that many who are ready to translate an interesting history, or edit the text of a favourite poem, shrink back from undertaking a task so onerous, we might almost say so thankless. Yet of the achievements of scholarship a good Catalogue and a good Dictionary are perhaps the highest; and we may well congratulate ourselves that, at a time when Persian literature is, on the whole, so neglected in England that, in this branch of letters, we no longer occupy the second, or even the third, place among the nations of Europe, a standard work of each class should within one year issue from the English press.

It is in the domain of Persian poetry that Dr. Ethé has hitherto rendered the most signal services to literature; and it is to the forerunners, contemporaries, and successors of the immortal Firdawsî that his attention has been more especially directed. On the biographies, relations, and works of these, as well as on the early developments of the literary revival which succeeded the Muhammedan conquest, his laborious and painstaking investigations—embodied for the most part in a series of monographs published in different German periodicals, but summarised and condensed in the admirable article on Persian literature which he contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica—have shed a flood of light. This being so, it is scarcely surprising to find that in the Catalogue it is in general biographies of poets which receive the most detailed description; that one such work should occupy twenty-seven columns, another fifteen, another thirteen, another—the well-known Âtash-Kedé—thirty-one, and another—the unique and hitherto unknown work already alluded to—no less than eighty. We are far from regretting the length of these descriptions, whereby, indeed, the value of the Catalogue is greatly increased. Yet, though all sections of the work are well and conscientiously done, it is easy to see which has aroused Dr. Ethé's keenest interest and most diligent activity.

From what we have already said we trust that it will be sufficiently evident that we regard the Bodleian Catalogue as in every respect deserving of the highest praise, and fully worthy of Dr. Ethé's great reputation as a Persian scholar. Yet, since we conceive it to be the duty of a critic to indicate those points wherein the work submitted to his scrutiny is weakest as well as those in which it is strongest, we feel compelled to state in what respects the Catalogue might have been rendered even more useful than it actually is. And in so doing we do not desire to cast the slightest shadow of disparagement on the work before us, which, in our opinion, could not have been done better by any Persian scholar in Europe, but to call attention to a very serious defect in our literary apparatus which Oriental scholars should without delay take steps to remedy. What has been said about Indian MSS. of Persian works applies also in great measure to Indian printed or lithographed editions of the same. The best Persian texts come not from Lucknow or even Bombay, but from Teherân, Tabriz, and Constantinople. These latter are, however, not only difficult to obtain, but their very existence can sometimes hardly be ascertained by those resident in Europe. Some valuable information about recent publications of the Persian press are, it is true, to be found in the Indian Antiquary, Indian Notes and Queries, and other periodicals. Most of these have been contributed by Mr. Sidney Churchill, of the British Legation in Teherân, whose acquaintance with current Persian literature is probably unequalled. Yet these notices are brief and scattered; they cover only a small portion of the ground. And, to be brief, there exists at present no convenient method of discovering whether a given work has or has not been lithographed or printed at Teherân or Tabriz, while many modern works of reference of the greatest value remain unknown to European scholars for many years after their appearance. Thus it is that even so careful and diligent a scholar as Dr. Ethé has failed to notice some of the best Oriental editions of the works before him, and has been unable to elucidate certain points which a reference to recent Persian publications would have fully cleared up. These assertions might be illustrated by a good many examples, but we must necessarily confine ourselves to a few.

With regard to the first point, then—the failure to notice Oriental editions—we will cite only the following instances, indicating the works in question by their number in the Catalogue.

Nos. 797 and 800, two works of the celebrated wit and satirist Obeyd-i-Zākāni entitled respectively "The Mouse and the Cat," and "Pleasantries." No published text of either of these is mentioned, though the first has been lithographed at Bombay, and of the second a very nicely printed edition was issued about three years ago from the press of Ebū'z-Ziyā Tefrik Bey in Constantinople.

No. 892, the "Leylā and Majnūn" of Maktabi, was lithographed two years ago in Bombay.

No. 1251, the very important Sūfi treatise of 'Irāki entitled "Lama'āt," with the Commentary of Jāmi, has been lithographed in Teherān.

Other examples might be adduced, but we must pass on to the second point—the failure to make use of recent Persian works of reference to elucidate matters on which they would have thrown no small amount of light. Now, one of the best modern biographies of Persian poets is the Riyāzu 'l-'Arifin of the late Rizā Kulī Khān (the author of numerous works of great value, among which the continuation of Mirkhond's great history down to our own times is especially worthy of notice), which was published two years ago in Teherān. No reference is made to this work by Dr. Ethé in speaking of Fāni (No. 1281), Afzalu 'd-Dīn of Kāshān (No. 1445), or Bābā Tāhir of Hamadān (No. 1298, § 50), though pretty full notices of all these writers are given in it. In the case of the last (whom we suppose, in default of any evidence to the contrary, to be identical with the author of the very popular quatrains written in what the Persians generally call the Lūr dialect) some reference should, we think have been made to M. Clément Huart's article in the Journal Asiatique for 1885, which contains, besides a discussion on the dialect in question and its relations, the text and translation of fifty-nine of Bābā Tāhir's quatrains. M. Huart was unable to fix the date of this writer more closely than as "anterior to the eighth century of the Hijra," since it was not specified in either the Ātash-Kedé or the Nuzhatu 'l-Kulūb; but in the Riyāzu 'l-'Arifin it is stated quite definitely, for he is said to have died in A.H. 410. Of course, the author of the treatise noticed by Dr. Ethé may not be identical with the author of the quatrains, yet the name is an uncommon one, and the question appears at any rate to merit a discussion.

There are one or two other cases where it appears to us that European authorities who ought to have been referred to have been passed over in silence. This is especially the case with regard to No. 1218 in the Catalogue, a MS. containing the text of some of the ta'ziyas or passion plays enacted in Persia during the month of Muharram. In reference to this subject, Dr. Ethé cites, in addition to his own studies on the matter, Polak, Gobineau, and Chodzko. Was it right entirely to ignore the valuable work of Sir Lewis Pelly and Mr. Wollaston published ten years ago by Messrs. W. H. Allen, which contains translations of no less than thirty-seven of these ta'ziyas collected in Persia, carefully rendered into English, and illustrated by a preface and many valuable notes?

Several similar omissions might be noticed, but these will suffice as illustrations. And, after all, it is a graceless task to try and detect flaws in a really valuable and scholarly work. The fact is that, in this field of literature, the harvest is great and the labourers are few; and it is chiefly in the hope of inducing some to turn aside from the well-worn paths of Greek and Latin into the almost unexplored domain of the Persian classics that we have been impelled to point out at some length how much remains to be done here, and how many laurels are still to be won. For the rest, we can only congratulate the Bodleian Library on its treasures; the Clarendon Press on its work; and the authors of the Catalogue on having produced not merely a permanent monument to their own erudition and diligence, but an invaluable addition to the scientific literature of the age.

EDWARD G. BROWNE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ETRUSCAN AND LIBYAN DIVINITY-NAMES.

Barton-on-Humber: April 10, 1890.

Dr. Brinton has kindly sent me his brochure, On Etruscan and Libyan Names (vide ACADEMY, March 15, 1890, p. 192), section iv. of which treats of "Names of Divinities," and contains the following suggestions among others:

Libyan Abru, in an Inscription Ifru = Etruscan Aplu, Apulu. But few will doubt that Aplu is a contraction of Apulu (=Apollo); and Pauli (Die etr. Zahl. 25-7) denies any Etruscan r-l or l-r change, while Dr. Brinton gives no instance (cf. Deecke, "lalan falsche Form für laran"). The Libyan Gurail = Etruscan Culsu; but, besides the r-l difficulty, u is a usual Etruscan feminine divinity ending, e.g., Alpnu, Tarsu. Apropos of a Leukothes, Dr. Brinton connects the Etruscan Mlacux with the Libyan amelal, "white." I fail to see any connexion, and have suggested that the love-goddess Mlacux, represented with (the Tyrian) Hēraklēs, is the Semitic Melekheh (cf. Jer. vii. 18), "the Queen" of heaven (Robert Brown, jun., The Etruscan Inscriptions of Lemnos, p. 21). The Etruscan Sehlans (vide ACADEMY, July 20, 1889, p. 42) "may be from the Libyan root s'h, strong"; but, as De Brosses observes, "Ce n'est pas dans les possibilités qu'il faut étudier." The Etruscan Tina (vide ACADEMY, November 12, 1887, p. 323) = the Libyan Mastiman, mas being "the common Libyan (and Etruscan) prefix of grandeur." But it is singular that the Etruscans should always omit this prefix in the very name of all others in which we should expect to find it, and where, if Libyans, they must have been accustomed to use it. In the name Turms (vide ibid.), "we appear to be in the presence of the ancient Libyan radical TR." If so, appearances here are distinctly deceitful.

The Etruscan goddess Munduux is connected by Dr. Brinton with the Etruscan-Roman Mantus, and both with the Libyan Motmantus. All three appear to me to be wholly unconnected. On the mirrors, Munduux assists in adorning Malavix, and dances with Xelqun (?Κελλίον, "Fruit-rind"); and the name divides itself into Mun, + θ ("the abstract suffix," Sayce), + ux (a class-ending, vide ACADEMY, May 4, 1889, p. 309). She is a kindly spirit, somewhat like the Graces; and mun in many Turanian dialects means "heaven," "high," &c. The flat-nosed, leopard's-skin clad satyr Xelqun, with a goat's tail, is a Greek concept, like his fellows of the Bacchic train; and it is not improbable that the dance of Munduux (a heaven-spirit) with Xelqun (an earth-spirit), depicted on a late mirror, contains a reference to the mystic cosmic nature-dance of Dionysos.

On the general question, Dr. Brinton will do well to explain, if he can, the silence of antiquity respecting any Etruscan movement from Libya, coupled with the vast amount of tradition which connected the Etruscans with the East, the views of the ancients being summed up in the dictum of Seneca, "Tuscos Asia sibi vindicat" (Consol. ad Helv., vi. 9). The theory of archaic "Etruscan invasions of Egypt" is, I think, now exploded; nor can much be gathered from the Libyan names recorded by Bishop Corippus, "who lived at the court of Justinian," and wrote when Africa had for centuries been a Roman province.

As to the Etruscan clan (vide ACADEMY, March 15, 1890, p. 192), Etruscologists render it "son," because it is translated by "F" (= filius) in the familiar bilingual inscription Fab. No. 460; and this meaning exactly agrees with the Turanian etymology (vide ACADEMY, May 4, 1889, p. 309).

ROBERT BROWN, JUN.

SCIENCE NOTES.

DR. W. WAAGEN, of Prague, has contributed to the Palaeontologica Indica another memoir on the Salt Range, in which he sets forth the geological conclusions drawn from the detailed study of the fossils described in his former papers. To illustrate the physical features of the country, Dr. Waagen introduces four excellent landscapes, executed from sketches which he made on the spot when attached to the Geological Survey of India. The Salt Range is regarded by Suess as skirting the Hindu Kush, and occupying towards this system a position similar to that which the jurassic ranges of Switzerland occupy towards the Alpine system; the geographical positions being, however, reversed in the two cases. In fact the elevation has been in opposite directions; for while the Alpine system has been moved from the south towards the north, the Central Asiatic system has been moved from the north towards the south.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

ARISTOTELIAN SOCIETY.—(Monday, March 31.)

SHADWORTH H. HODGSON, president, in the chair. —Mr. H. W. Blunt read a paper on "The Philosophy of Herbert of Cherbury." There is a harmonic or analogical correspondence of our faculties with things, but our truth is not itself the truth of things. Our truth is (1) of appearance, (2) of conception (3), of that which organises and judges of these, intellect. Intellect must infer rightly from right premises, and can correct those which are wrong. Ultimate true premises are common notions not derived from experience, but given by natural instinct. These notions are made explicit by a method of interrogation, based on a novel system of categories, and are verified chiefly by the consensus of all sane men. Applying this metaphysic to religion, Herbert establishes as common notions five catholic articles, which comprise monotheism—for ancient polytheism was symbolic—and personal immortality. The world is likened to a musical instrument, where men must discern the single design of the maker and performer. Herbert's rationalism has in it no trace of pantheism, but he does not admit an evil principle.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

SHELLEY SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, April 9.)

DR. F. J. FURNIVALL in the chair.—Mr. G. W. Foote lectured to a large audience on "Shelley's Religion." Denying the truth of Robert Browning's assertion that Shelley, had he lived longer, would have been reconciled to Christianity, the lecturer contended that, though Shelley was variously influenced by the moods in which he wrote, there was no important break in the continuity of his thought. Trelawny was cited as an authority for the fact that the atheism of "Queen Mab" remained Shelley's creed to the end; it was the style of "Queen Mab," and not the matter, that Shelley afterwards repudiated. Reference was made to Mr. Stopford Brooke's admission that Shelley was a pantheist only in his higher hours; and it was argued that Shelley's pantheism was nothing more than the outcome of his poetical sympathy—an imaginative personification of inanimate Nature. Granting that Shelley's early materialism was exchanged for the ideal philosophy of Berkeley, yet such idealism was a very different thing from a belief in deity; while the utmost that can be quoted from Shelley in favour of the immortality of the soul is the expression of a poetical hope rather than a deliberate conviction. Mr. Foote supported the main contention of an exceedingly interesting lecture by quotations from "Laon and Cythna," "Prometheus Unbound," "Julian and Maddalo," and other poems.—A discussion followed.

NEW SHAKSPEARE SOCIETY.—(Friday, April 11.)

DR. F. J. FURNIVALL in the chair.—Miss Grace Latham read a paper on "Rosalind, Celia, and Helen." "As You Like It" was probably written when Shakspeare was suffering from the faithlessness of his friend of the Sonnets and the dark lady. Thus, while the play possesses the poetic beauty, the brilliancy, and buoyant young life of Shakspeare's early period, it has an underlying strain of world-bitterness, which is also the keynote to the character of Rosalind, and is the effect of her life of danger and constraint at her uncle's corrupt court. It gave her a wide experience of the world, sharpened her power of observation, inclined her to perceive the follies and weaknesses of human nature rather than its nobler qualities, made her suspicious even of Celia's devoted affection; and the strength of these impressions is increased by her essentially truth-loving, genuine nature. Once free in Arden, her joyous, daring, practical character asserts itself; but the lessons of her early life are not forgotten; she dares not believe in Orlando's love, lays elaborate plots to test it, and is defeated by her own perfect impersonation of the knavish boy. She is treated with indifference, patronised, and encouraged by her lover. His honest, upright nature, combining daring and generosity with well-balanced common sense, is a revelation to her; and, once secure of his love, she gives herself gladly to him. Celia is one of the most beautiful of Shakspeare's women. Her love for Rosalind finds its expression and its reward in tender, devoted service, and is saved from weakness by its strength and selflessness; ready to defend and act for her in every emergency, she remains at other times contentedly in the background. The suddenness of her marriage with Oliver has been criticised; but her gentle nature has no distrust to delay the acknowledgment of her love, and its story could not be more prominent without interfering with the main interest of the play. Helen in "All's Well that Ends Well" is one of those determined, tactful women who will use any means and submit to almost any degradation or hardship to gain their ends; but who, preferring the substance of power to its shadow, never force those whom they govern to recognise the extent of their intellect and strength. The apparent contradictions in her character are accounted for by the tremendous force of her will, which often blinds her to the real nature of the means she employs to gain her end. Rather observant than clear-sighted, she perceives the surface facts of life distinctly, but not its undercurrents of vanities, prejudices, and affections.

Thus, Bertram's determined resistance to his marriage is unexpected by her. Without Rosalind's quickness, she cannot instantly mature her plans; but, when formed, she is able to compel the services she needs, and override circumstances. Bright, witty, Rosalind guides her life; the tender, poetic Helen shapes hers; but the most beautiful, if least powerful, character of the three is the gentle, loving, unselfish Celia.—The chairman much commended the way in which Celia's character had been brought out, and finally given the crown of place. He observed that it took a woman to discover and point out any flaws in Rosalind's character.

FINE ART.

Pen-Drawing and Pen-Draughtsmen: their Work and their Methods. A Study of the Art To-day, with Technical Suggestions, by Joseph Pennell. (Macmillan.)

MR. JOSEPH PENNELL—with the good help of the effective allies whom he has found in printers, binders, and publishers, in the artists who have aided him by the use of drawings, and those who have reproduced their work—has set his name on the fore-front of a sumptuous volume which it is right pleasant to handle and run the eye over, a volume, finally, which one has much satisfaction in placing upon the very stateliest of the shelves of one's book-room.

It may be doubted, however, whether its author has not committed an initial error upon his very title-page—whether the book might not most fittingly have been styled "Pen-Drawing as adapted to Modern Means of Reproduction"; for, from first to final page, Mr. Pennell has concentrated his attention not so much upon the "pen-drawing" as upon the form in which that will at length appear before all the world in the next issue of The Century. This painful pre-occupation with process reproduction has done much to warp the writer's judgment, to limit his range of vision; and, especially, it has produced a quite curious effect—one comparable to that yielded by a reversed telescope—when he has chanced to turn his gaze upon the past, making the "great" masters of the olden time seem to him but pigmies in pen-drawing; for—benighted men—did they at all respect, did they even know, the true technical conditions of the art, as finally formulated in the editorial sanctums of Yankee journalism? Did they do anything at all but dip quill or reed in ink, and quietly record or interpret, in simplest fashion, what of nature could, in this way, be most readily recorded or interpreted? As Mr. Pennell truly remarks, "Now, pen-and-ink drawing is another thing." Is it indeed a better one, a thing more artistic?

Our author informs us that, as at first planned, his volume was to have been "a small handbook of pen-drawing"; and throughout all these noble broad-margined pages, which are the form it has finally attained, the writer seems to have been hesitating continually between a modest desire to adhere to his original aim of producing a handbook for guidance in early practice of pen-drawing and the more ambitious scheme of making his book the ultimate pronouncement, the final authority, upon that form of art with which it deals. And it is just in this want of definite and unwavering grasp of a central aim, the absence of logical grip, of due and obvious sequence of things that should follow each other, of fitting emphasis upon what he should have made prominent, of, in fact, general balance, consistency, mutual relation of part to part, that Mr. Pennell evinces his literary inexperience; though, truly, incoherences of individual phrase also are by no means hard to seek—witness that sentence which terminates at p. vii. of the Preface, a very triumph and masterpiece of "puzzle-headedness," one that we should find it hard indeed to match in our own not very severely restricted range of reading.

Mr. Pennell seems to have attained to a perception of the truth that the "draughtsman" should have learned to draw; the farther fact that a writer should be able to write is as yet beyond him. But, on the other hand, when we regard Mr. Pennell's volume not as a comprehensive treatise upon pen-drawing, or as a final appraisal of the respective rank of its practitioners, but rather as the stray jottings of a most accomplished draughtsman upon an art which has made him eminent, the case is changed, the value of the book appears. It is not from an artist—whatever Mr. Pennell may think—that we can expect a satisfying view, a comprehensive estimate, of art, or of any wide branch of it. "A runner cannot be a sign-post as well," was the saying of an American, though he was certainly not Mr. Pennell; but the notes upon art of a practised and accomplished technician, like the writer of the book now before us, have always their worth—worth that lies at its lowest in their suggestiveness. The chapter here upon the "Materials for Pen Drawing," and that giving "Technical Suggestions for Pen Drawing," are excellent and to the point, will be helpful and of value to anyone taking up the art. There is much, too, that is good in that more debatable chapter dealing with "Reproduction in Pen Drawing."

As for the illustrations, they form a perfect cabinet of varied and representative examples of what is at least an interesting, if it may, perhaps, prove but a passing, phase of contemporary art, of modes of technique which the science of to-morrow may, perhaps, deliver from those reproductive limitations which presently hamper its freedom and restrict its range.

A RELIC OF NAUKRATIS.

Westbury-on-Trym: April 14, 1890.

It is not, perhaps, generally known that the Central Park Museum in New York contains an interesting votive tablet, apparently from the site of Naukratis. The tablet is dedicated by one Komon, son of Asklepiades, who filled the office of public treasurer at Naukratis under Ptolemy Philopator, and is addressed to Isis, Serapis, and Apollo, for the welfare of the king. The letters, which are boldly incised, measure three-eighths of an inch in length, and the stone, which is of Grecian marble, measures about 10 inches by 7. It is slightly damaged at the upper corners.

Prof. J. A. Paine, Keeper of the Egyptian Department, has very kindly given me a paper cast of the inscription, which reads as follows:

[]ΑΣΚΙΑΔΕΩΣ ΠΤΟΛΕΜΑΙΟΥ ΘΕ[]
[]ΕΓΑΛΟΤ ΦΙΛΟΠΑΤΟΡΟΣ ΣΩΤΗΡΟΣ
ΚΑΙ ΝΙΚΗΦΟΡΟΥ ΚΑΙ ΤΟΥ ΤΙΟΥ ΓΕΛΕΜΑΙΟΥ

ΚΟΜΩΝ ΑΣΚΛΗΠΙΑΔΟΥ
ΟΙΚΟΝΟΜΟΣ ΤΩΝ ΚΑΤΑ ΝΑΥΚΡΑΤΙΝ

"Ἐπερ β]ασιλεὺς Πτολεμαίου θε[οῦ καὶ νικηφόρου, καὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ Πτολεμαίου

Ἰσιδι, Σαρπάδι, Ἀπόλλωνι
Κόμων Ἀσκληπιάδου
Οἰκονόμος τῶν κατὰ Ναύκρατιν

"Komon, son of Asklepiades,
Public treasurer at Naukratis,
[dedicates this tablet] to Isis, Serapis, Apollo, [for the welfare] of king Ptolemy the great god, Philopator, saviour and victor, and [for the welfare] of his son Ptolemy."

Prof. Paine suggests that the use of the word "victor" points to some date closely following upon the battle of Raphia.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

We understand that the site on which Mr. W. M. Flinders Petrie proposes to begin excavations for the Palestine Exploration Fund (as stated in the ACADEMY of April 5) is Khurbet 'Ajlân, the Egion of the Book of Joshua. In accordance with the terms of the firman, all objects found in the course of the excavations (except duplicates) must be sent to the museum at Constantinople; but the Fund has the right of making squeezes, sketches, models, photographs, and copies.

THE private view both of the Royal Academy and of the Grosvenor Gallery is fixed for Friday next, May 2.

A COLLECTION of Mr. William Strang's etched work will be on view next week at Mr. Dunthorne's gallery in Vigo Street. Other exhibitions are those of Mr. Burne Jones's series of four pictures, entitled "The Legend of the Briar Rose," at Messrs. Agnew's gallery in Old Bond Street; and an exhibition of art contributed by members of the Company of Cordwainers, at their hall in Cannon Street.

ON Thursday next, May 1, Mr. Lewis F. Day will deliver the first of a course of lectures on "Design applied to Wood-carving," at the Society of Arts.

MR. HARRY FURNISS's Royal Academy Antics, with sixty illustrations by the author, will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. next week.

THE first number of Royal Academy Pictures for 1890, which will be ready by the opening day of the exhibition, will contain reproductions of pictures and sculpture by the following:—Sir F. Leighton, Sir J. E. Millais, Sir J. Gilbert, H. H. Armistead, P. H. Calderon, Thomas Faed, F. Goodall, Herbert Herkomer, B. W. Leader, Seymour Lucas, J. MacWhirter, W. O. Marshall, J. Pettie, E. J. Poynter, Hamo Thornycroft, E. A. Waterlow, H. T. Wells, T. Woolner, and W. L. Wyllie.

BY far the most important picture sale of the summer season will be that of the late M. Gustave Rothman, a noted diplomatist, who took an active part in the events which preceded the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71. The collection, which has been gathered together during the last twenty years with the assistance of the doyen of French art-criticism, M. Paul Mantz, comprises choice examples of the Dutch, Flemish, and French schools, with some few specimens of German and Italian art. Among its chief gems are a superb "Femme au Gant," by Frans Hals; the "Portrait of a Syndic," by Jordaens; the celebrated "Christ driving out the Money Changers," by Jan Steen; and an unsurpassed series of landscapes by Van Goyen, Jacob and Salomon Ruysdael, Philip de Koning, Van de Capelle, and others. Lovers of rarities in Dutch seventeenth-century art will be tempted by the charming "Page" of W. O. Druyster—a skilful genre painter, by whom only two other works are at present known; and by a not less rare "View in Holland," by Oudenroge. The French section of the collection includes "La Dame au Parasol," by Lancret; "La Musique" and "La Peinture," two brilliant pieces of decoration by Boucher; a charming piece of genre by the scarce Lépidé; the portraits of Buffon and the Duchesse de Châteauroux, by Jean-Marc Nattier; and the masterly presentment of Barrère, by David. The catalogue, a magnificent folio, which equals or surpasses in the splendour and profusion of its illustrations anything yet attempted in the same style, contains, besides innumerable phototypic reproductions, etchings by Waltner, Boilvin, Le Rat, Lalanne, and Lucas. The sale will take place in Paris at the gallery of M. Georges Petit, on May 29, 30, and 31.

MUSIC.

MR. F. H. COWEN'S THORGRIM.

THIS work, written and composed expressly for the Carl Rosa Opera Company, was produced at Drury Lane, under the composer's direction, on Tuesday evening. The story of the new opera is founded upon an episode in the ancient Icelandic Saga, "Viglund the Fair." Mr. Joseph Bennett, the librettist, has often displayed literary skill; and in this, his latest venture, we find, indeed, much to praise. But good versification has nothing to do with a good plot; and it is of importance to know what this is like. Is the story a powerful one? Has it unity and interest?

Act 1. Harold Fair-hair, king of Norway, visits Jarl Eric. The latter has two sons: Helgi, by Arnora, his wife; the other, Thorgrim, is "love-born." The festivities in honour of the king are interrupted by a quarrel between the two brothers. Helgi's followers, urged on by Arnora, seek Thorgrim's life. The latter, insulted by Sweyn, one of Helgi's men, kills him. The king and his guards interpose, and at Eric's request Harald takes Thorgrim into his service. Act 2. Three years are supposed to have elapsed, and the king is receiving in state his principal Jarls. With the daughter of Jarl Thorir, Olof Sunbeam by name, and the promised wife of Helgi, Thorgrim falls in love at first sight, and boldly demands her hand. Her father will not retract his word. Thorgrim renounces the king's service, since Harald will not interfere in the matter, but threatens that one day he will return and take vengeance. In Act 3 we have a secret meeting of Olof and Thorgrim in a pine forest near her father's hall. He obtains her promise to follow him whenever he summons her to his side. Helgi, sword in hand, surprises the lovers, but lacks courage at the decisive moment, and, as the curtain falls, we see him trembling and leaning upon his sword. Act 4 opens with the marriage ceremony of Olof and Helgi. Thorgrim and his men enter suddenly, and extinguish the lights in the hall. Amid the excitement Thorgrim and Olof escape, and make their way to a ship in readiness. As the curtain descends, the voices of the lovers are heard singing:

Thine on land and on the sea!
Thine wherever thou mayest be!
Love, till I this life resign
Ev'rywhere and always thine.

In this story of deadly enmity between two brothers, an audience would naturally sympathise with Thorgrim, for he is bold as a warrior and as a lover; Helgi, on the other hand, is cowardly and irresolute. Yet Thorgrim's conduct in trying to win from his brother his affianced bride is not to be commended. He is like Tristan, only without the excuse of the love-potion. And then, though justice is not on his side, he succeeds in his plans: passion triumphs. There is nothing in Olof's character particularly to attract one; while as for Helgi's mother, Arnora, she has the thankless task of continually trying to rouse a weak-minded man to action. There is unity about the story, for the close of each act accentuates the ill-feeling existing between the brothers; but it has not sufficient interest, or rather what interest it possesses is weakened by the somewhat colourless rôles of the king, the Jarl Eric, the mother, and even Helgi.

Mr. Cowen opens with a short instrumental prelude leading to a vigorous chorus of warriors, and a martial dance is accompanied by some characteristic music. A Scald's Song, with chorus, was omitted. This is a simple but highly effective number. However, it delays the action of the piece, and so the sacrifice shows judgment. The king now sings a ballad, "The Viking's ship sails o'er the main," tuneful but not striking. Next follows a drinking chorus: the music is bright and spirited, but one may, perhaps, complain that it is a little too smooth and regular in rhythm for Northmen of the tenth century. The wrestling scene between Thorgrim and Helgi, with the taunts of the partisans on either side, is a bold and exciting piece of writing. When the king enters and stops the brawl, the orchestral accompaniment assumes quite a Wagnerian character. With respect to representative themes, it may at once be said that they are used in the opera with a certain skill and discretion. There is no attempt to imitate the elaborate combinations of the Bayreuth master. Arnora sings in vigorous strains of revenge. Thorgrim, when the king, taking his part, presents him with an armlet of gold, sings an effective song, "Pride of the North, whose conquering sword." There is a good swing about the music, and it is well, if somewhat heavily, scored. The finale is short, and it winds up with the "Pride of the North" theme taken up by the chorus.

The second act commences with a march, which serves, of course, for the entry of the king's guests. The principal theme is firm and dignified, while the second one is soft and graceful. The scene between Thorgrim and Olof when they first meet, and he falls suddenly in love with her, has music particularly characteristic of the composer. Helgi and Arnora now occupy attention, and then Thorgrim sings a delicate little ballad lightly scored. The composer uses here with effect a saxophone to echo voice-phrases. In the finale we note a taking, though conventional, concerted passage for principals and chorus, opening with a melodious love theme, which afterwards does duty in the third and fourth acts, and an agitated allegro as Thorgrim retires, threatening to return.

The third act is short. Olof, in the pine forest, is surrounded by her women, who sing to her "the story of Ivar," a graceful and pleasing ballad for solo and chorus. In Olof's scene, "Once more the Sun," the flowing music and delicate orchestration are striking features. The love-duet with which the act closes is one of the composer's highest achievements. There are some excellent contrasts in it, and it is worked up to a fine climax. It has both lyrical charm and dramatic force. The closing phrase may, perhaps, for a moment recall a famous passage in "Tristan"; but the music of this duet shows originality. The lovers are interrupted by the arrival of Helgi, and a few bars for orchestra brings the act to an end.

In the fourth and last act some sombre and dramatic music give special piquancy to the charming bridal chorus, "In robes as white." The little symphony with its characteristic chords and rhythms deserves special mention. The appearance of Thorgrim is the signal for more agitated music. The close of the opera, as the lovers passing seaward in Thorgrim's warship sing strains from the love song, is pleasing to ear and eye.

With regard to the performance, we can only say that for a first night it was good. Mlle. Zélie de Lussan, as the graceful Norwegian maiden, Olof, sang with charm and feeling. Miss Tremelli, as Arnora, made the most of her part. Mr. Barton McGuckin, as his part of Thorgrim demanded, acted and sang with energy. Mr. Celli, as the king; Mr. Crotty, as Helgi; Mr. Max Eugene, as Eric—were, of course, efficient. The chorus sang remarkably well. The piece was brilliantly mounted. The house was full. The actors were called before the curtain after each act, and the composer at the close of the performance.

J. S. SHEDDOKE.

MUSIC NOTES.

MME. SOPHIE MENTER, who has not visited London for some time, appeared at the Crystal Palace last Saturday afternoon. This lady first made her mark here as an exponent of Liszt's music, and her brilliant performance of the "Don Juan" Fantasia has not been forgotten. This time she selected Schumann's Concerto in A minor, a work in which, although there is plenty of opportunity for technical display, poetry is an important element. Of all the Concertos written since Beethoven, it is indeed the one in which the material and the spiritual are most evenly balanced. Mme. Menter played remarkably well—with exception of the cadenza in the first movement, which was certainly not clear—although she did not enter into the true spirit of the music. She afterwards played some Liszt pieces with much success.

MR. FREDERIC LAMOND gave a pianoforte recital at Prince's Hall on Monday afternoon. His reading of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 110) was intelligent and expressive. Here and there, however, in the first movement the lights and shades were too strongly marked. The performance of the two sets of variations on a Paganini theme by Brahms was a brilliant tour de force. No pianist who has not full command of the keyboard can venture to play them. Mr. Lamond further exhibited his skill in Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," but with these were somewhat disappointed; they sounded, with the exception of the finale, somewhat tame. The programme concluded with some Liszt and Raff solos, to which the pianist did full justice.

MR. JOHN ST. O. DYKES gave a pianoforte recital at Prince's Hall on Wednesday afternoon. He has been well trained and is decidedly clever, but, through nervousness or excitement, often hurries the tempi. This was specially perceptible in Mendelssohn's E minor Fugue and Schumann's Toccata. Miss Helen Trust sang Grieg's Solvejg's Lied with great charm and refinement. Herr Hess joined the concert given in Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata. Mr. Dykes should beware of long programmes; the first part occupied nearly an hour and a half.

FROM Charles Woolhouse we have received:

Kinder-Album. By Carl Weber. (2 Parts.) These are very easy piano pieces for beginners, mostly within the compass of five notes, and even where this is exceeded, the thumb is not shifted. The little compositions are extremely clever and attractive. It is astonishing how much M. Weber has been able to accomplish with such modest means.

Melodic Studies. For Pianoforte. By I. A. de Orellana. Book II. Educational works, even when good, are often dry; but if a composer is able to render the music pleasant as well as profitable, it is far more satisfactory, at any rate to students. It is this union which renders the studies of Moscheles and Chopin so attractive. M. de Orellana has worked on this plan, and with considerable success. The music is only of moderate difficulty: some numbers, indeed, are easy, only requiring careful phrasing.

L'Estasi, by Alexander S. Beaumont, is a light, bright, florid vocal waltz.

I Love Thee, with 'Cello or Violin Obligato, by W. Noel Johnson, is a melodious and effective song. It gained a prize at the North Midland section of the National Society of Professional Musicians.

The women of to-day are tolerably sure to read its pages with avidity, and to revel in it. That it contains clever work goes without saying, and it is certainly one of the strongest stories which even a lady novelist has hitherto had the courage to produce."—Court Journal.
"There are many attractive subsidiary characters... The life led by strolling theatricals; the scenes commonly associated with Monte Carlo; and the trials of maiden teachers are among the incidents effectively utilised by a clever novelist."—Scotsman.

"...that fertile writer—Mrs. Hibbert Ware... Quaint, queer, and questionable trade tactics and social customs peculiar to Lancashire and Yorkshire in the beginning of the seventeenth century, are not only carefully detailed and contrasted with those of modern times, but they are skilfully utilised in the development of what, after all, is a pleasantly told love story of the olden times. Highwaymen, too, confiding maidens, poets, purse-proud persons, penurious 'prentices, and wily witches, figure prominently among the admirably sketched characters met with in the novel."—Scotsman.

"Mrs. Hibbert Ware describes picturesquely, and meditates romantically... She is careful in her conversations and choices of incidents to keep to the tone and manner of the time. 'Fairfax of Fuyston' is on the whole, perhaps, the best book of the kind we have had for some little time, and a great advance in many ways on other works by the same hand."—Whitehall Review.

Boyhood, Adolescence, and Youth.

By LEON TOLSTOI,

Author of "Anna Karenina," "What I Believe,"
 "War and Peace," &c.

Translated by CONSTANTINE POPOFF.

"An excellent translation."—Saturday Review.

"Extremely interesting. Tolstol's power of description is admirably shown in the pictures of Russian scenery. Some of the incidental characters bear the impress of real portraiture."—Times Weekly.

"Mr. Popoff's version is easy, natural, and 'free and despoiled of Gallicisms.' The translator has a command of English idiom, and his piece of work is a decided improvement on the translation of Miss Hopgood's."—Speaker.

"Supplying an unquestionably graphic picture of the Russia of the time."—Globe.

"Delightful and characteristic specimens of Tolstol's writing."—Manchester Guardian.

"Singularly eloquent and deeply interesting. The translation is exceedingly well done, the English being clear, vigorous, and forcible."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"Mr. Stock's publication derives its chief merit from its translation by a native of Russia. Mr. Popoff's English is remarkably good; so good, indeed, that it is only here and there, by dint of hard searching, that we can find anything betraying the handling of a foreigner."—Bookseller.

"The ordinary versions raise a suspicion by their style that they have not been rendered direct from the author's Russian, but from the French versions that are so widely circulated. In the double transmission from speech to speech, Tolstol's expression, as may be supposed, gets curiously distorted. Mr. Popoff seems to have worked from the genuine Slavonic. An English reader could not read the story in a better rendering."
Scotsman.

NEW VOLUME OF VERSE.

Now ready, complete Edition, in handsome crown-8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 3s. 6d. post free.

The Poems of William Leighton.

Illustrated by JOHN LEIGHTON.

"Good taste, sense, sensitive feeling, and easy verbification are their chief characteristics.....The outcome of a generous mind."—Athenæum.

"All of them good, and many exquisitely beautiful."
Literary World.

"The same qualities of tenderness and grace and melodious versification are to be observed throughout."
Spectator.

"Charming and tender pages."—Standard.

"Gems, all pure and sparkling."—Family Treasury.

"The versification is never at fault, and a certain natural refinement displays itself in every page."
Bell's Life.

"A sweet singer."—City Press.

"Very beautiful verse, both pictorial and didactic."
Court Circular.

"Tender and graceful poems."—Guardian.

"The natural expressions of a pure and tender heart."—Queen.

"Whoever loves sweetness and vigour, thought and feeling, will admire and love these charming poems."
Morning Post.

"The only words to express our opinion of these charming poems are those of unqualified commendation. They disarm criticism; for when we would examine rigorously, their sweet tones enter into the heart, exciting its deepest sympathies, and winning us to admiration."—Weekly Budget.

"Scotland may well be proud to claim amongst her tuneful sons the pure-minded, sweet singer whom she cannot but regret.....Had he lived he must have won a high place in our literature; as it is, he has enriched English poetry with many admirable pieces, which will live and set readers thinking for many a long day to come."—Graphic.

LITERATURE.

THE ORIGINS OF FEUDALISM IN FRANCE.

HISTOIRE DES INSTITUTIONS POLITIQUES DE L'ANCIENNE FRANCE. Par Fustel de Coulanges. I.—La Monarchie Franque. II.—L'Alleu et le Domaine Rural. (Paris: Hachette.)

Histoire des Institutions Politiques et Administratives de la France. Par Paul Viollet. (Paris: Larose et Forcel.)

THE premature death of M. Fustel de Coulanges has deprived the world of the hope that he would complete his history of the origins of feudalism. His labours, however, were conducted upon such exact methods and with such constant verification of results that it was possible for him to publish before his death three preliminary volumes. The first dealt, as he modestly stated, with "certain historical problems," among which may be specially mentioned the nature of the rural tenancies under the Roman Empire, the extent and character of the civilisation of the Free Germans in the first centuries of our era, and the judicial organisation of the early Frankish kingdoms. The next volume is especially concerned with the nature of the Merovingian monarchy and the much-debated question whether it was in fact a continuation of the imperial government in a debased form. M. Viollet, on the other hand, desires us to believe that the Frankish monarchies, after making allowance for the increase of dignity resulting from the victories of Clovis, still continued to be Germanic kingdoms of the primitive type. Both writers would agree as to the acceptance of the Roman civilisation by several of the invading nations. The Visigoths seem to have willingly undertaken the task of preserving the influence of the Civil Law, though even among their descendants in Spain there remained for ages many traces of their German institutions. The Burgundians appear to have actually felt a strange reluctance to break with the imperial traditions; and their kings, though forced by circumstances to assume an independent power, were always ready to profess their subordination to the empire in the East. M. Fustel de Coulanges showed in a former work that this state of things continued until the sixth century.* M. Viollet points out that the consular dates, which are never found in the epitaphs of the Merovingians, were used through the first quarter of the next century on the sepulchral stones of Burgundy, and that even in later generations the chronologists of the Burgundian kingdom were accustomed to reckon by the regnal years of the emperors at Constantinople. He sums up the matter in a striking paragraph.

* Histoire des Institutions politiques de l'ancienne France, 1^e partie, 2^e edit., 1877.

"Lorsque déjà le soleil a disparu à l'horizon, un reste de lumière peut arriver, à travers la nuit commencée, jusqu'à la terre: ainsi l'empire romain, depuis longtemps détruit dans la moitié du monde, projetait encore dans l'Occident quelques faibles rayons."

So far as the Franks are concerned, it may be said, after considering both sides of the question so ably discussed, that in all that relates to the administration of justice and to the character of the laws we find a very strong Germanic element among the Franks of the Merovingian age. As regards the election of the kings and the calling of popular assemblies, M. Viollet is right in calling attention to the surviving traces of German customs, which M. Fustel de Coulanges was disposed to reject too absolutely in consequence of their not appearing in the more important charters and edicts. But the last-named writer was nevertheless right in supposing that the whole character of the government during this period was influenced in every detail by its Roman model, and that the administration of the palace and its splendid crowd of officials was a copy, if not a continuation, of the system which had flourished under the Western Empire. In the last of his published volumes he reverts to the more difficult task of determining the proportions of the Roman and German elements of the new civilisation so far as it was concerned with the domain of property and private law. It has been commonly said that the Merovingian kings actually introduced the feudal system by granting their domains to military vassals in return for service in war. It is now admitted that this theory must be abandoned, and that the connexion of lord and vassal, in any exact sense of those terms, did not arise until a later age, though the beginnings of the system, still separate and uncombined, may be found under the imperial law and among the German customs.

The historian proposed in the volume before us to consider the forms of landholding and the incidents of tenure during the centuries with which the Middle Ages may be said to begin, to examine the title shown to the possession of the soil, the rights which by common consent were attached to such possession, the distinction between ownership and occupation, the separate rights of the tenant, and the dominant powers of the lord. He shows us that the soil of Roman Gaul was divided into estates or private domains. These were retained without much alteration during the Merovingian epoch, and after passing through many interior transformations are now for the most part represented by the modern communes. The villa, or "curtis," as it was afterwards called, was worked principally by gangs of slaves. Here and there were a few farmers whose descendants in time became bound to the soil. The lord's praetorium answered to the modern château, though such mansions were not fortified until the destruction of the Western Empire. Little by little it became the practice to let the slaves have precarious holdings on onerous terms; and in course of time we find the estates carved out into "manse" or tenements, of a size and value thought suitable for the tributary homesteads—even the lord's demesne came to be treated as the "manse" which it was customary for the master to keep in hand. When several domains were united in one ownership they were treated as forming a "massa," and districts of this kind were found to be particularly suitable to the purposes of local taxation. The fiscal area was never changed when it had once been entered on the imperial registers, or on the corresponding records of the Frankish kings. The name of each "manse" and of its holder was entered on the rolls, and the items of taxation were adapted to this mode of keeping the register. It is easy to see how a system of this kind was likely to promote fixity of tenure and uniformity of custom. There were a few small estates in some domains, enclosed on all sides by the lands of the great proprietor. These were described as situate "within the march," or "in the boundary" of the principal estate, and in course of time the territory itself became known as the mark or the "terminus" or "finis." It was also called a "potestas," with reference to the powers of the owners of the soil. The name of the "manor," which was given to the same territorial unity after the lords had acquired seigniorial jurisdiction, has reference to the system of regarding the demesnes as the principal manse or mansion, a term which was not restricted to the mere dwelling-house until a much later period. The work contains many interesting details as to the condition of the slaves in the Merovingian age. They seem to have been rising into the condition of a class of customary tenants, nearly as well off in fact, though not in legal theory, as the lower classes of freed men. Among tenants of the kind last mentioned there were many varying degrees of freedom—King's men and the Church's men, citizens to whom freedom was bequeathed by will, freed-men under hereditary patronage, those who had bought their liberty out and out, "Liberi Homines" who could go where they pleased, and "Liberi Homines" subject to crushing obligations of tenancy. M. Fustel de Coulanges has traced with wonderful skill the long series of changes by which a class of farmers in arrears with their rents became fixed to the soil as coloni, free as against all the world, except the piece of land which they were bound to cultivate and the master whose choice determined the extra labours which they owed him in lieu of rent. We are shown how this tenure was adapted to the cultivation of forests and tracts of waste land, and was found to be a convenient way of forming settlements for a subject population, as in the case of the German tribes brought into the empire after the victories of the third and fourth centuries. In later times we find that the colonus is still nominally free, though he can never leave his little plot of land nor escape the labours due to the lord of the soil. While the slaves were rising into a customary form of serfdom, the colonus was sinking into the condition of an ordinary serf. His dues were not very heavy in amount, but there was a degrading uncertainty about the mode in which they might be claimed. The principle was universally admitted that the tenancy of land rendered its holder subject to the superior power of the landowner. Even in the case of free tenants holding under contract, we may observe a gradual tendency towards subjection of this kind.

"Le colon ressemblait fort au serf, et l'homme libre au colon. Mêmes redevances presque toujours, et mêmes corvées. C'est apparemment que ces redevances et ces corvées apparaissent aux yeux des hommes, non comme un acte de servitude ou d'oppression, mais comme le prix légitime de la terre dont ils jouissaient."

The agricultural tenancies, originating in so many different ways, came gradually together and assumed one form, of which the chief characteristics were fixity of rents and perpetuity of tenure, since everything tended to become hereditary in that age. M. Viollet takes up the subject at this point, and shows how it was inevitable under these conditions that the occupier should in time acquire the absolute ownership.

The death of M. Fustel de Coulanges occurred before his last published volume was quite through the press, and before he had added the final notes and corrections. The materials which he had prepared are, however, in such a perfect state that there was no difficulty in completing the work in accordance with his last intentions. His pupils and collaborators hope to continue the publication of the MS. materials so as to cover the period between the Merovingian age and the middle of the ninth century. Two volumes, which will appear without delay, will be concerned with the Empire and the Barbarian Invasions; these will be followed by an important work on the nature of the feudal "Benefice"; and, if it is possible, the materials with which he was last engaged will be put together and published as an essay on the institutions of the Carolingian Empire.

CHARLES ELTON.

Henrik Ibsen's Prose Dramas. Edited by W. Archer. Vols. 1 and 2. (Walter Scott.)

THE first half of the new translation of Ibsen's prose dramas is not calculated to modify very appreciably the current and by no means altogether adequate conceptions entertained about him by his English audience. All the six plays which it contains belong to the series of "social" dramas which opened in 1869 with "De Unges Forbund," and, after the colossal interlude of "Keiser og Galilæer," has continued uninterruptedly ever since. The plan of publication compels us still to wait not only for this—the one work of Ibsen's in which the execution fails to do justice to the grandeur of the design—but for the noble historical tragedy of "Kongsemnerne," which probably represents more nearly than any other of the prose dramas the Ibsen of "Brand." Moreover, the two "social" dramas here translated—and brilliantly translated—for the first time, are precisely those which make the smallest appeal to the uninitiated, while even the hardy Ibsenite digestion absorbs them without extraordinary relish. They have the interest of turning-points in a remarkable career, of boundary posts marking the limits of its progress in particular directions, but hardly that of great and original works.

The earlier of them, "The League of Youth," forms a kind of prelude to the series, but one separated by eight years from the first of its successors—and not by eight years only. For to that interval belongs the change which turned the Scandinavian satirist into the Juvenal of European society at large; and the preacher of will as the one thing needful into the assailant of social conditions by which will is paralysed or depraved. Judged by these canons, "The League of Youth" belongs as evidently to the group of plays which precede it as, in form and atmosphere, it does to those which follow it; and, clever as it is, it lacks both the sombre intensity of the latter, and the imaginative power which gives permanent and universal charm to the primarily Scandinavian tragedy of "Brand." It is a scathing picture of the political life of Norway in the decade 1860-70, the relative fidelity of which was attested by the impartial denunciations with which both political parties received it when first performed in Christiania. It bears obvious traces of the mood which produced its immediate predecessor, "Peer Gynt," the symbolic type of modern Norway as seen by Ibsen, through an atmosphere not quite undisturbed by angry memories, from his coign of vantage in Italy. Take a minute corner of the vast canvas which displays the world-history of Peer, set it under the microscope of the realistic observer, fill in its largely-limned outlines with the detail of everyday life in a little Norwegian town, brimful of unsatisfied ambitions disguised as political aspirations and enthusiasms, and you have the essential elements of "The League of Youth." Stensgård is an "adventurer" of diminutive stature beside Peer, and he altogether lacks the poetic suggestiveness of the man who loses his individuality, his self, by living for nothing else. But he might say of himself as justly as Peer:

"If in my inmost vitals you pried, You'd find pure Peer, and nothing beside."

And his career is, at least for the moment, wrecked by a variety of that very Halbheit, that distraction among different and incompatible modes of self-assertion, which is the cardinal motive of Peer's career. Only—and this links the play to the later group of dramas with their recurring studies of social hypocrisy—Stensgård is not a frank cynic like Peer, but a pretender, whose weakness it is to be intensely accessible to the influences which he affects to scorn. If he lacks the frankness of cynicism, however, he has that of naïveté to a degree rarely found, it must be confessed, outside the ranks of those unfortunates who owe their existence to the creative indignation of the satirist. Surely it is Ibsen and not Stensgård who anatomises the motives of the latter in this remorseless passage, which, we may add, loses no particle of its original zest and power in Mr. Archer's English:

"I must extricate myself from these sordid surroundings. I can't go on living this unlovely life. Here I have got to be hail-fellow-well-met with Tom, Dick, and Harry; to whisper in corners with them, to hob-nob with them, to laugh at their beery witticisms; to be hand in glove with hobbledohs and unlicked cubs. How can I keep my love of the People untarnished in the midst of all this? I feel as if all the electricity went out of my words. I have no elbow room, no fresh air to breathe.

Oh, a longing comes over me at times for exquisite women! I want something that brings beauty with it! I lie here in a sort of turbid eddy, while out there the clear blue current sweeps past me."

"The Wild Duck," the second of the plays now for the first time translated, resembles "The League of Youth" in its almost entire absence of relief; but the gloom which pervades it is immeasurably deeper. The one is a vigorous exposure of the rottenness of political life by a man who had never really shared in or cared for it; the other is a stab directed, in despondent self-mockery, at the aspirations with which the prime of his own manhood had been identified. The comparison of it with "An Enemy of the People" is extremely interesting, and at the same time pathetic. The subject of both is the shattering of a house of lies, reared by private fraud and sheltered by public ignorance. Stockmann is a true Samson among the Philistines, the strong man who, whether he stands or falls, leaves the world the better. But Gregers Werle's ideal strivings are touched with the morbidity of the society in which he lives; he is something of a Hedonist in his beneficence, as Stensgård is in his political agitation. "If I am to go on living, I must find some cure for my sick conscience" is the utterance of a moral invalid. And when, as a result of his pursuit of this needed purgative of good works, the house of lies, which enshrines the fortunes of his old friend, falls to the ground, the crash produces only a dust and odour of ruin for which we are none the better, and we close the book half inclined to echo the parting malediction of the cynic Relling upon the "confounded duns who keep pestering us, in our poverty, with the claim of the ideal."

It would be very unfair to the editor if we were to close without special reference to the quality of the English version of these plays. As he justly says, in the admirable critical note prefixed to the first volume, Ibsen's prose plays are "in one sense very easy to translate, in another very difficult." It is easy enough to express in some fashion the always lucid meaning of the original; but extremely hard to render it idiom by idiom, with nice observance of its innumerable shades of tone, complexion, and manner. Mr. Archer has eminently chosen translation in the "very difficult" sense, which, for the reader, means the easy and delightful one. A close comparison of a considerable portion of these plays, both with the original and with previous English versions, enables us to attest the unwearying care and the critical felicity which have determined their final form. His versions in the "Camelot" volume have been revised afresh, and made still more colloquial and idiomatic, still more minutely faithful than before. If we had a criticism to make, it would be that the translation errs here and there by the defect of its quality—that it sometimes discriminates without occasion, and varies without need. One does not, for instance, quite see why in "The Pillars of Society," Fru Rummel's Nej, skal vi virkelig få se beridelse should be translated, "Oh, are we to have a circus?" and Dina's Jeg vilde gerne se beridelse, three times below, "I should like to see the horsemanship." Nor, similarly, why småstæderne, a sort of catch-word of Hilmar Tønnesen's, should be rendered "small towns" in one place, and "provincial life" in another. Conversely, in "the Wild Duck" (transl. p. 259), the use of the same word to express both Gregers': Hm; tviler ikke på det, and Werle's reply: Ler du? Tror du kanske ikke det er sandt, hvad jeg siger ("Hm! I don't doubt that. You laugh? Perhaps you doubt me?") is either an awkward repetition or an unauthorised point. It is inevitable, too, that here and there one should differ from the translator as to the appropriateness of particular English idioms to the class and manners of the speaker. Such cases are in the present instance very rare; but we rather demur to such a phrase as "They had taught me a lot about duties, and so on," in the mouth of Fru Alving in "Ghosts." The rendering of Aslaksen's catch-word De lokale Forhold, by "the local situation," does not appear to be very felicitous, and Mr. Archer himself discusses it rather apologetically. The German Die lokalen Verhältnisse comes nearer the mark.

It will be seen that the blemishes which we have felt called to note are of the most microscopic and insignificant kind. The art of prose translation does not perhaps enjoy a very high literary status in England; but we have no hesitation in numbering the present version of Ibsen, so far as it has gone, among the very best achievements, in that kind, of our generation.

C. H. HERFORD.

"ENGLISH MEN OF ACTION."—Captain Cook.
By Walter Besant. (Macmillan.)

It is really surprising that a writer whose tact and judgment in such a matter might have been supposed above suspicion should have been capable of such a fantastic biographical freak as vitiates the early chapters of this volume. It happens that the existing materials for an account of Cook's boyhood are meagre—though not more so than is notoriously the case with many other equally celebrated men—and therefore Mr. Besant has thought fit to supplement history by a deliberate Dichtung und Wahrheit presentation of his hero's youth and budding manhood. The only possible palliation of this ill-judged procedure is its candour—the reader is not kept in any irritating uncertainty as to which is the Dichtung and which the Wahrheit; but the method itself is altogether regrettable. In the first place, whether the slightness of our knowledge of Cook's early years is really a grievous misfortune may very well be doubted; this is not a case in which minute knowledge of a man's private history and character could throw any side-light upon the value or significance of his public services. But assuming that our previous ignorance was really a thing to be deplored, it could at any rate be remedied only by the substitution of new facts, not by interpolations of romance. Mr. Besant treats with quite justifiable contempt Hawkesworth's "elegant" polishing of Cook's plain tale of the First Voyage; and it is thus all the more strange that a writer who expressly puts on record his sense of the paramount value of unadorned directness of narration should himself fall into an error radically worse than Hawkesworth's eighteenth-century passion for periphrasis. Mr. Besant's imaginative colouring is picturesque enough, but it is not biography. Picturesque, too, though not historically indispensable, are his breezy descriptions of north-east-coast fisher-life—descriptions with just that salt smack about them which only an accomplished marine-artist knows how to give. But the result of all this is that we have got through rather more than a third part of the book before we begin our circumnavigation of the globe by setting sail from Deptford on board the Endeavour.

Having thus discharged the disagreeable duty of grumbling, it is pleasant to bear witness to the general excellence of Mr. Besant's volume. On the whole, we should suppose that he must have found his task an easy, as it has evidently been a congenial, one. There lay ready for him an ample sufficiency yet not an embarrassing superabundance of material, and he has used it with the skill which his readers would naturally expect from so practised and deft a hand. It is not necessary, perhaps, to give unquestioning assent to every one of his dicta. He more than once speaks of Cook as the greatest of navigators, without clearly defining the grounds of his hero's title to the premier place. When supremacy is thus claimed for him, one instinctively runs over in one's mind the long list of his Dutch and Elizabethan and Peninsular predecessors; and one cannot but think of some of them as possessing in larger measure not only the initiative faculty, the divining gift by virtue of which the pioneer seems to include the poet and vates, but also that fiery enthusiasm of discovery which is equally a kind of inspiration. Cook was "the heir of all the ages" of maritime exploration, and started with many advantages which his forerunners mostly lacked. Besides the comparative poverty of their mechanical appliances and means, they had to contend against far more serious moral obstacles, such as the frequently recurring scepticism of their crews as to the feasibility of the enterprises they were engaged in—scepticism liable at any time to flame out into fierce reproach, culminating in a mutinous and murderous attitude of the men towards their supposed misleader. Nevertheless, we must be on our guard against merely relative valuations by which it is so easy to argue that one man was greater than another because his achievement was less indebted to the accident of favouring conditions. The ultimate adjudication must always be based upon a practical appeal to results, and here Mr. Besant's own words help us to an intelligible conclusion—albeit, a conclusion somewhat other than his own. Speaking of the slight official recognition accorded to Cook's magnificent services—slight by comparison with the honours which would have been showered upon such a man in our own day—Mr. Besant says, "he had given to his country Australia and New Zealand—nothing less." Precisely so; and must we not, therefore, rank him second to the great Genoese who "had given" the world still more?

Questions of precedence in glory, however, are not particularly fruitful matters; and it is more interesting to note the way in which

Mr. Besant puts before his readers such facts as may enable them to form a correct notion of the various causes that conspired to render Cook's success so superb. Conspicuous among these was his mode of grappling with those tremendous sanitary problems of which the imperfect solution had brought disaster upon so many earlier attempts to explore the dark places of our planet. When we read how Wallis's only idea of an anti-scorbutic regimen for his disabled and agonised crew was to dose them with unlimited mustard and vinegar, we can appreciate the immense importance of the dietetic reforms which Cook instituted after profiting by the severe lesson of his First Voyage. Even he, however, failed to anticipate all that modern science has done in this direction; but he was so far successful as to be able in his subsequent voyages to keep the terrible spectre of scurvy at bay on the whole, and thus to avert the one danger which else was alone sufficient to ruin the most splendid projects.

Mr. Besant has full faith in the account of Cook's murder given by Hopkins in his History of Hawaii. Without pledging oneself to implicit reliance upon Hopkins's extraordinary narrative, it must be admitted to receive a good deal of unconscious corroboration from the long extracts Mr. Besant is enabled to give from a previously unpublished log kept by one George Gilbert on board the Discovery, even if it be not indirectly supported by some things in the captain's own journals. According to this story, Cook and his companions were taken by the natives to be greater and lesser gods, and were paid divine honours, until certain untoward circumstances brought about the disillusionment of the Hawaiians, together with such a hostile revulsion of feeling on their part as prepared the way for the tragic sequence which we know. If this were so, it is impossible to deny that Cook's conduct in some particulars showed amazing lack of judgment. When Watman died, the captain ought certainly to have buried him out at sea, not on shore in the presence of natives who had supposed him one of the dei minores; and then, if they missed the old fellow, they could have been allowed to imagine him translated to some higher sphere of being more in harmony with his divine attributes. By the way, one of these attributes, common, of course, to the whole godlike company, was the habit of smoking. Such amiable condescension as the willingness of these immortals to unbend in dalliance with earth's daughters would not, as Mr. Besant recognises, in any way detract from their divinity.

Mr. Besant abstains from any attempt to whitewash the one spot in his hero's character which is apt to wear a darker hue in our eyes than in those of our forefathers. Indeed, the new details culled from Gilbert's journal rather tend to deepen the shade. Not to mention his account of the stolen goat affair, from which we get perhaps a clearer notion than before of the indiscriminate chastisement inflicted by Cook upon even the remotest accomplices in a crime of no very great turpitude, the following new instance of Cook's administration of justice shows him, if possible, in a still harsher light. The narrator is George Gilbert:

"Played off some fireworks here, which were viewed by a numerous assembly with acclamations of admiration and surprise. These Indians are very dexterous at thieving, and as they were permitted to come on board the ship in great numbers, they stole several things from us. This vice, which is very prevalent here, Captain Cook punished in a manner rather unbecoming of a European—viz., by cutting off their ears, firing at them with small shot or ball as they were swimming or paddling to the shore, and suffering the people (as he rowed after them) to beat them with the oars and stick the boat-hook into them wherever they could hit them; one in particular he punished by ordering one of our people to make two cuts upon his arm to the bone, one across the other below his shoulder, which was an act that I cannot account for in any other way than to have proceeded from a momentary fit of anger."

No doubt Cook had to make a deterrent example of natives with Autolycean propensities; but this extreme severity is difficult to defend, and is hardly consistent with Kippis's moral estimate of his hero. After enumerating his other characteristics, Kippis tells us:

"To all these qualities he added the most amiable virtues. . . . That it was impossible for anyone to excel him in humanity is apparent . . . from his behaviour to the natives of the countries which were discovered by him."

Kippis also quotes something from that great poet Mr. Hayley about the "mild Cook." After all, however, there go to the making of heroes some greater qualities than mildness; and ordinary standards of moral criticism must not be applied too rigidly to the conduct of a man whose few acts of positive cruelty were incidental to the pursuance of designs by which all mankind are his debtors. Still, one thinks of the strict injunctions which a Spanish government laid upon Columbus to treat with scrupulously tender consideration the aborigines of any country he might colonise, and the comparison does not flatter our patriotism.

WILLIAM WATSON.

Further Reminiscences. By Thomas Adolphus Trollope. (Bentley.)

MR. TROLLOPE here continues the autobiography which he brought out about two years ago under the title of What I Remember. That work ended with 1865, when his first wife died. For some time after his bereavement he was bowed down by a conviction that existence had no further attractions for him; but the old story so charmingly illustrated in Marivaux's Surprise de l'Amour was to be repeated in his case, and that with the best possible results to both the persons concerned. Of the second life thus begun he now gives us a fluent and entertaining record.

Briefly described, it has been a life of almost unintermittent literary activity under Italian skies, varied by excursions into France, Switzerland, Germany, Austria, or Belgium. Mr. Trollope may well wonder how it was possible to work so much as he did. Novels, historical books, and contributions to periodicals of all kinds—quarterly, monthly, weekly, and daily—came from his pen in truly rapid succession. On this point he has a pretty confession to make. His memory remains good, but of the innumerable articles he sent to London and America he has no more recollection than if they had been produced in a former state of existence. He is even unable—at least so he avers—to say what all his novels were about. To do him justice, he does not suppose that this facility was otherwise than fatal. He wrote too much to write well, however valuable his more ambitious undertakings, such as the History of the Commonwealth of Florence, may still be deemed. Perhaps the best of his work during the period covered by this volume was done at Ricorboli, where, having found his old quarters in Florence unendurable, he bought a pretty little farm. In 1873 he was appointed correspondent at Rome of the Standard. Meanwhile he had suffered a ruinous loss; but his honorarium from London, added to the little he had left, deprived him of all right, he tells us, to pose as a poor man. Fifty years of residence abroad has not extinguished his love of England; it is on the south coast of Devon that he has elected to pass the rest of his days.

Some of the passages in the book possess historical interest, although they are less numerous than the opportunities offered to Mr. Trollope might have led us to expect. In the summer of 1870, just before the war cloud rose above the horizon, he had sundry conversations at Heidelberg with professors of the university there:

"I found the discontent with the present political aspect of things and the prospects of Germany general and vehement. They one and all spoke with the greatest detestation of the aristocratic militarism of Prussia; and, though desirous of unity, they deprecated the danger of that union with Prussia being accomplished at the cost of liberties which they then enjoyed. They admitted that many men of high culture and commanding talents were to be found among the aristocratic classes of the north of Germany, whereas among those of the south and of the districts around them there was nothing but absolute nullity to be met with; but they feared Prussia and her political ideas."

Gervinus, whose acquaintance Mr. Trollope made at this time, showed that his minute studies of Shakspeare had not blinded him to the portents in the sky, little as he could have foreseen what the immediate future was to bring forth:

"Our sympathies were altogether with Germany and the struggle which began to be probable between France and Prussia. But Gervinus feared for the independence of his own part of the Fatherland. 'People say,' he repeated more than once, 'that Germany will swallow Prussia. But it will not be so; Prussia will swallow Germany.' And though it could not, I think, be said that he was French in his sympathies, he certainly did not wish to see Prussia yet more powerful than she then was."

Mr. Trollope rightly asserts that the importance of the part acted by one statesman in the unification of Italy has hitherto been underrated. Ricasoli was an "indispensable factor" in that achievement.

"I am well able to testify that it was his invincible firmness that deflected the repeated and various tempting and urgent persuasions addressed by the third Napoleon to the provincial government at Florence to induce them to demand the separate autonomy of Tuscany. This unshakable and courageous firmness was the leading characteristic of Ricasoli. He was never a popular man. The Tuscans called him the 'Iron Baron,' and were as incapable of duly valuing his high qualities as they were quick to feel and resent his deficiency in the more popular graces of character and manner."

It may reasonably be said that Mr. Trollope ought to have given some instances of the "invincible firmness" he refers to. In another matter worthy of elucidation he is equally reticent. Leo XIII., in deference to the advice of the cardinals, thought fit, on the day of his proclamation as Pope, to depart from the ancient custom of appearing on the balcony of St. Peter's to give the crowd on the piazza below the benediction "Urbi et Orbi." Mr. Trollope holds this to have been a fatal mistake, adding that he has probably much better means of forming an opinion on the point than those who counselled his Holiness to shrink from the traditional ceremonial. What those means were, however, we are not told.

Perhaps the most important of the men brought before us in the book is Emerson, to whom Mr. Trollope was introduced in Rome. How limited in his sympathies the American philosopher could be in one way is clearly shown:

"My first impression of Emerson was that he was an exceedingly dry man. His outward appearance as well as his manner gave me that idea; but it wore off in conversing with him. Of course his talk was mainly of Rome and things Roman, of which, as may be supposed, his appreciation was not very favourable. Of course he saw in the fullest and strongest possible light, not only those superficial grounds of offence which are but too apparent to every thoughtful Englishman or American, but the whole underlying causes of mischief, which in the social, and yet more in the religious, sphere of ideas are operative in preventing the national character from becoming all that the well-wishers of Italy could desire it to be. But it seemed to me that his mind was not equally alert in discovering certain equally underlying good things tending to produce excellences of character, perhaps of a different and possibly of a subordinate order to such as he was in search of, possibly even of a kind incompatible with the latter. Certainly his own mind was about as un-Italian as one as could well be imagined. I hardly think, however, that he would have supported the contention of his daughter, to the effect that all that art has done in architecture or on canvas for the adornment of the creature's worship of his Creator has tended to the abasement and not to the exaltation of it, and that four white-washed walls are a more fitting and more inspiring locale for such purpose than any cathedral ever raised by human hands."

Matthew Arnold left a more favourable impression on the author's mind:

"I suppose that Emerson must be credited with having produced a wider and deeper effect on the thought of the generation in which he lived. But to me Arnold appeared a far more many-sided man, stored with a much larger receptivity and stronger capacity for assimilating all the mental perfections to be sucked out of all that was around him—the sights, the men, the institutions, the ideas political, religious, social. Doubtless Emerson would have claimed the nil humanum [sic] me alienum puto; but it seemed to me (possibly very erroneously) that the attitude of mind so described was a more active and operating intellectual principle in the mental constitution of the Englishman."

Lever was one of Mr. Trollope's neighbours at Ricorboli :

"Of all the many writing men and women I have known, Lever's talk was more like his books than that of any other. He would rattle on till you might fancy that he was giving you pages from Harry Lorrequer or Charles O'Malley. I don't think he much appreciated our musical evenings. He liked 'talk, sir,' like Dr. Johnson, though not quite perhaps of the same sort. How well I remember the schoolboy-like glee with which, just after he had been appointed Consul at Spezia, he told us that the Minister had said to him, 'There is nothing on earth to do, and you are just up to the work.'"

Mr. Trollope justly estimates the comparative merits of the foremost Italian tragedians of the time :

"Perhaps Salvini is the only non-speaking English actor to whom Shakspeare in his greater characters could be entrusted with some confidence. Rosai was very markedly coarse, loud, and vulgar. He had magnificent lung power, and he used it like a ranter. . . . Salvini very fairly represented Hamlet; he was Othello. I remember that in the latter part his innovation of substituting his drawing his dagger across his throat for a stab to the heart struck me as injudicious, partly because the former action would necessarily have been followed by torrents of blood, whereas the hæmorrhage caused by the latter need not have been more than his garment might well conceal for at least the necessary minute."

Longfellow, genially ready to talk alike with the wise and with the foolish; Holman Hunt, always full of the results of thought; Anna Swanwick, bearing a heavy load of learning with the best possible grace; Jenny Lind, as delightful off the stage as she had been upon it; Schiff, devoted heart and soul to the study of comparative anatomy; Frederick Hardman, never brilliant or showy, but solid in judgment, statesmanlike in his views, and absolutely devoted to his duty according to the highest conception of it; of these and of other interesting persons we have acceptable glimpses.

Nor does the attractiveness of the volume end here. It contains many descriptions of scenery and life abroad, besides a profusion of more or less readable anecdotes. An incident that occurred at Bruges may be thought deserving of note.

"I found at the post a letter for my wife; but the official told me that they were strictly forbidden to deliver a wife's letters to her husband, observing, with the air of pointing to the most self-evident fact, that a contrary practice would have the effect of causing very serious trouble in families. I observed that in that case it would be better not to allow the husband to become aware that there was any letter for his wife. 'Quite so,' agreed the discreet and secretive official, and went on to tell me that it was quite irregular that I should have seen the packet of letters, and would not have happened had I not been a foreigner. Of course the peace of foreign families was a matter of less concern to the Belgian post-office."

FREDERICK HAWKINS.

Kloof and Karroo. Sport, Legend, and Natural History in Cape Colony. By H. A. Bryden. (Longmans).

THIS is a pleasant book, with a valuable account of the fauna of South Africa. Some portions of it have already appeared in the Field, St. James's Gazette, and elsewhere; but we cannot complain of the republication.

Mr. Bryden is a real lover of nature, and regards the big game of the Cape with tender affection. He takes no pleasure in slaughter, and grieves over their diminished numbers and (in one instance, that of the quagga) extermination. The Boers are the great enemies in this respect.

"Since the Dutch landed and firearms were introduced, the history of the fauna of Cape Colony, and indeed of South Africa generally, has been one continued record of ceaseless, wanton, and shameful slaughter. It will be said that our own countrymen, as well as the Dutch, have had a great hand in this slaughter. To this I may point out that those of our own race (of course, with some exceptions) have more sportsman-like ideas than other nations, and have not joined in the useless slaughter and skin-hunting forays that the Boers have invariably and incessantly indulged in. Perhaps there is no better illustration of Boer wastefulness and of wicked destruction of animal life than the rolling plains of the Orange Free State. Thirty years ago these plains literally swarmed with Burchell's zebra, quagga, wilde-beestes (gnu), blesbok, and springbok. The Dutch found that the skins of these animals brought them temporary wealth; and, in consequence, scarcely a head of game can now be found in that country. The bones of these beautiful creatures lie literally whitening the veldt—all have vanished, and the life of the Free State Boer is now robbed of half its former charm."

The government at the Cape has of late years passed some stringent game laws. Close periods have been established, and the slaughter of some of the rarer animals prohibited for a term of years. It is to be hoped that the result may be as successful as in Switzerland with regard to the chamois. Some of the English farmers do their best to preserve; and the author mentions certain contiguous farms where the koodoo is preserved, and hunted only a few days in the winter of each year. As a consequence, it is now fairly plentiful; and it is a curious fact that these koodoos never wander upon the farms of the neighbouring Dutchmen, where their extinction would be certain. The only large game now to be found within the limits of Cape Colony are the elephant, buffalo, zebra, koodoo, and leopard; the smaller antelopes are, however, still abundant. The elephant is preserved in the Knysna Forest, and with the buffalo is still found in the dense bush of the Eastern province. It is about twenty years since the hippopotamus disappeared from the Great Fish River, though still to be found in the Orange River; there is not much probability of protection being extended so far as this unwieldy monster.

Mr. Bryden gives a curious and characteristic conversation with a Boer who fought at Majuba Hill, which is well worth reading. The Boers were naturally puffed up with their own success and our pusillanimity, nevertheless our author speaks of them in a kindly spirit. He mentions that their love of hoarding is such that it was not an uncommon thing for one of them to have £10,000 or £12,000 lying in his name in specie. Even now, in spite of bad times, large hoards are stored in the family chest. He considers that their miserable system of farming has much impoverished the land, their habit of crowding cattle into the same kraals has spread diseases, and their reckless destruction of forests altered the climate and diminished the rainfall. Happily now there appears to be a rapid increase in the system of tree-planting. Within the last few years, Arbor Day, a celebration borrowed from America, has been observed throughout the land; and now each year on the anniversary, which is observed as a general holiday, thousands of trees are planted by men, women, and children. It must, however, be a long time before the continued destruction of two centuries can be repaired.

Mr. Bryden is sanguine as to the future of Cape Colony; irrigation is to do much.

"But in addition to irrigation by the catching and storage of water," he writes, "other sources are available. Until quite recently, it was imagined that the Great Karroo could never be made available, save for the depasture of the farmers' flocks. This mighty plain, waterless though it apparently is, has a marvellously rich soil, sun-baked, it is true, yet none the less fruitful where water can be brought to bear. It has long been known that streams of water, arrested by igneous dykes—called by the Boers 'yzer klip kopjes' (iron-stone ridges)—run plentifully beneath the surface of the plains. These are now being tapped and made use of. Windmills and wells are beginning to appear upon the karroo with highly successful results, and will undoubtedly now rapidly multiply."

Those who delight in the supernatural will find some exciting stories in Mr. Bryden's book. The Cape is now old enough to possess ghosts!

TITLE and story are in strict keeping with each other in One Another's Burdens. The burdens are unequally distributed; but that is true of life, and especially of some phases of married life, where selfish indulgence and insensibility are occasionally paired on one hand with patient suffering on the other. Miss Mann has depicted such a case—an extreme one perhaps, but still a possible one, though in actual life much of the pain of it would escape observation. Her villain is not openly a scoundrel or a blackguard. He is a clergyman of winning manners, who inspires a noble girl with love for him, and for a time impresses the people in his new parish with belief in his eloquence and earnestness. The reader sees behind the mask from the beginning; and it is melancholy reading to follow the frauds and pretences of the man, through scenes in which he is too heartless to feel the shame of his conduct, and where all the sorrow and bitterness are heaped upon his wife. Both are vividly drawn. The combination in Elgard of sham sentiment and depravity, of inward callousness and outward lying, is well managed. Bad as the fellow is, it is possible to imagine him as passing muster in society, undetected if not unsuspected. One feels more doubt about Miriam Elgard. Human nature, and particularly a high feminine form of it, is capable of great moral endurance, but it was an utterly mistaken sense of duty which made this brave woman accept burden after burden which she had every right to throw off. She was so possessed with the idea of self-sacrifice that after she had more than once drained the cup of bitterness to the dregs, she seemed almost to hold it out again to be refilled. Still, she may have been faithfully drawn from the life. There are women, as all the world knows, whose desire to be of service to others so entirely crushes out all thought of self that they would rejoice in martyrdom if it led to the high ends they seek. But those ends are mostly such as yield real satisfaction. Miriam Elgard, by refusing any mitigation of her lot when she ought to have welcomed help and deliverance, very nearly completed the wreck of her life which her husband had begun. There is another marriage in the book, which Elgard marred while he ruined his own. Dora Harrison's, indeed, is in some ways the sadder story of the two. A novel which deals with materials of this kind must necessarily lack brightness. Libbie Strong is a merry, natural girl, but even she does not escape the blight which Elgard's badness and Miriam's blindness impose on their surroundings. This want of relief from the prevailing gloom is the only fault of the book. In point of conception, of character drawing, and of directness and clearness in the telling, the story is good throughout.

Whatever may be the defects of Capt. Hawley Smart's novel, that of meagreness of plot is not one of them. He has a main plot, an under plot, and collateral plots. Such a redundancy in one direction almost argues deficiency in another, and the deficiency is really very marked. A novel ought to do more than bring out uncommon incidents, and show what comes of them. It is not beyond the scope of fiction to give us something to think about; and whether it do that or not, the matter of style is one which a writer of tales should not neglect. But Capt. Smart has apparently had no care for anything more than the mere telling of his story; and he tells it in slipshod English, which occasionally stumbles in grammar, and is oftener wanting in elegance. All this is plainly due to haste or carelessness. It is impossible to doubt that Without Love or Licence would have been a much better book if the author had taken more pains over it. Its intricacies of plot, however, will satisfy most readers. There is a dash, and in some instances more than a dash, of almost every quality that goes to the making of a sensational story—e.g., mystery, disguise, robbery, fraud, elopement, bigamy. Of love there is very little, and that little is clumsily managed. The mysterious reasons for the re-opening of the Old Dragon Inn are skilfully concealed until the proper time for revealing them. Brent's position in the story is well sustained, and few readers will guess who he is. The two prominent women present a complete contrast to each other, though one seems to be overdrawn, while the other is underdrawn. Capt. Smart—as his special public knows—is happiest in his descriptions of racing life and its belongings; and his best male character is undoubtedly Sam Mercer, a member of the betting fraternity. Hero or heroine, in the conventional sense, there is none; but the absence of these ordinarily essential people would not matter if there were enough in the story without them. Of busy scene and incident there is enough; of intelligent human interest there is very little.

Mrs. Hibbert-Ware, in Fairfax of Fuyeton, has reproduced with much vividness a phase of seventeenth century life. Her story has to do with the old merchant class and their surroundings in Yorkshire and Lancashire. Their quaint provincialisms and old-world ways are a little perplexing at first, but after the third volume the reader's difficulty is to detach himself from an order of things the charm of which he has then fully realised. Edward Fairfax, "poet and scholar," is the character to whom the author has given most care, and he is a portrait well worth knowing and keeping in remembrance; but the interest of the story centres in his daughter, Hellen. Her father, in spite of his wisdom and learning, believes her love-sick lassitude to be the effect of witchcraft. The girl gives some reason for the notion by her habit of falling into trances, and things are made unpleasant for the poor women who are suspected of witchery. But love, which was the only malady, itself does the healing. An attempt to save the life of her cousin, a recusant priest, with whom she had long been in love, brought back Hellen Fairfax to a right state of mind. This cousin, like Edward Fairfax, is drawn with affectionate care. The author has evidently sought to live with her people and understand them. The book is well written, sometimes with a little too much minuteness of description in matters of dress, but the descriptions of scenery are always good. A picture of a winter landscape is exceptionally so.

A Lover of the Beautiful is something more than "a study"—as Lady Carmarthen modestly describes it. The dimensions of the story scarcely admit of its being called a finished work; but an artist who has expressed so much in a sketch should have no difficulty in filling out the picture, or another of the same character, on a larger canvas. There is little plot, and little need of any, for the interest all consists in the elucidation of two characters—those of Guido della Varazis, painter and poet, and Amore, his wife. He is an idealist, with aspirations after beauty and perfection, which are altogether excellent; but they reach no mark, because they are only born of the intellect, and derive no impulse from the heart. Guido one day believes he has seen his ideal in the flesh. It is Amore, who comes upon him like a vision. He paints her portrait, and imagines that her beauty is all spiritual, and that the profound depths in her eyes are depths of intellectual wonder. She is as strongly fascinated with him—with his talk which makes life seem bigger and nobler, and with his aims that possess her young soul with enthusiasm. They marry, and life is great with possibilities for both, till she finds that she cannot reach to his high level, and he that he cannot stoop to hers. In the early days of their wedded life he paints a Beatrice, with Amore for model; and the first sketch, in which he has really caught the living expression of the sitter—the heart as well as the soul in the face—is a marvellous work. His friends beg him not to touch it again; but he recoils from the flesh and blood vitality in it, which he refines all away, and nothing is left but a dead perfection. Amore droops in such an air, and he wonders why. In moments of half-unconscious frankness she tells herself the reason. "I would rather die without a soul than live without a heart," was one of these helpless confessions. The end soon comes, but it brings the one melting touch which marries heart and soul. The story stirs both in the reader. It is full of high thinking, and has so much charm of manner and subject that one wishes it were twice as long.

Dollis Brooks inspires quite another wish. One wonders why such a book was written. Its moral is good, when it is reached; but that readers should have to find their way to a virtuous moral through an unpleasant record of vice is certainly not good.

Mr. Bret Harte brings us back to a healthy atmosphere. His Waif of the Plains has all the freshness, brightness, boldness, and character which no book of his ever lacks. It is a story of prairie travelling, of Indians, of boy and girl lovers; and there is just a glimpse in it of gold diggings and Californian life. What happens to the boy-waif, and how he comes to be started in the world with a good balance at his banker's, is told with a distinctly Bret-Hartean touch.

Pretty, pleasant, painful—these are the adjectives to be applied to Miss Katherine Macquoid's Haunted Fountain. It is exceedingly pretty as an idyll of the pleasant life in and about a chateau in Brittany, but the end is needlessly sad. There was surely no reason why a story, which might so easily have been made to finish well, should suddenly close in a double tragedy.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

THREE AMERICAN THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Whither? a Theological Question for the Times. By C. A. Briggs, D.D. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.)

The Poetry of Job. By George H. Gilbert, Ph.D. (Chicago: A. C. McClurg.)

The Lily among Thorns: a Study of the Biblical Drama entitled the Song of Songs. (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

THE above are three American books, though the first of them has also, happily, an English publisher. Prof. Briggs is well known as a leading Biblical scholar, a man of wide theological culture, and a loyal member of the Presbyterian Church in America. He thinks that modern Presbyterian orthodoxy has not altogether developed on right lines. He shows what the standards say, and what modern divines have thrust into the place of them. He admits the necessity of development, but wishes for a more truly catholic and yet scientifically justified development. "The drift in the Church ought to stop. . . . The barriers between the Protestant denominations should be removed, and an organic union formed." One may agree with the generous-minded author in this, or not; but it is most satisfactory to find that he is alike clear as to the fact that criticism has succeeded, or is succeeding, in destroying traditional errors, and as to the certainty that the assimilation of its continually growing results will contribute to place the Christian Church on a much firmer intellectual basis than it is at present. There is much both of historical and of dogmatic interest in this volume. Its author works in the spirit of his two greatest teachers—Rödiger and Dörner. What he owes to the latter we see before us. What he has learned from the former we can estimate partly from his own contributions to Biblical criticism, and partly from the works of his pupils; for the authors of the two remaining books are alumni of Union Theological Seminary, New York.

Dr. Gilbert passed from Dr. Briggs's lectures to those of Prof. Franz Delitzsch. He has now returned from Germany as a young professor, with this volume on Job in his hand. There is no parade of scholarship. He wishes to commend the poetry of Job to lovers of literature. But, useful as his interpretative essays may be, the speciality of the book is the translation, which endeavours to reproduce the rhythm of the (mostly) three-toned lines of the Hebrew. Here is a specimen:

"The man of woman born,
Short-lived and full of unrest!
He comes forth as a flower, and is withered;
Like a shadow he fleeth, and stays not.
E'en on this, Thou hast opened Thine eyes,
And brought me to judgment with Thee!
O came a clean one from unclean!
Not one!

If a limit is set to his days,
His number of morns known to Thee;
His bounds Thou hast set that he pass not;
Turn away from him that he rest,
Till he joy in his day as a hireling."

But is this rhythm in accordance with the genius of English verse? And is not the gain on the side of rhythmic accuracy more than counterbalanced by the loss on the side of literary elegance. For there can be no doubt that the author of Job was not only a man of soaring genius, but an artist in the use of words. We are tempted to prefer the paraphrase of Job in triplets by a countryman of Mr. Gilbert's—Dr. R. W. Raymond (New York, 1876): "The three lines of this stanza permit either the condensation of two of the Hebrew couplets, or the expansion of one, as the rendering of the thought may require." Prof. Reuss's version in artfully varied German blank verse is also much more fitted to attract students to the poem than Mr. Gilbert's; and yet, just as we are not satisfied with a single translation of Dante, why should we not express gratitude for the scholarly toil which has produced so novel and, to a student, interesting a result? Only we must protest against Mr. Gilbert's assumption that Lowth and Herder are his only predecessors in the aesthetic appreciation of Job, and that this great poem itself is superior to the works of Homer, Dante and Milton. Dante perhaps a Presbyterian can with difficulty appreciate; but how comes he to depreciate the Puritan poet? Considering that Milton absorbed not only Job, but almost all other great poems, and that his native genius was equal to his acquisitiveness, is it not probable that he excels Job as much as, according to Delitzsch's latest view, "the second Isaiah overshadows the first"?

The last book on our list, charmingly printed at the Riverside Press, Cambridge, Mass., well deserves a cordial recognition, though its author modestly disclaims scholarship. He sees that the appreciation of the Bible as literature does not hinder, but rather helps, the due exhibition of its spiritual truths. The book consists of two parts—I. History and Criticism; II. Studies and Comments. The Revised Version of the Song is adopted as the basis. Could a more literary version have been supplied, the book would for its limited purpose have been well-nigh perfect.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Statesman's Year-Book for 1890 (Macmillan) has undergone considerable changes, which show that Mr. J. Scott Keltie interprets liberally the responsibilities of his new editorship. While the familiar appearance is preserved in externals, the entire form of the work and much of the details have been remodelled. To begin with, the British empire has been placed in the front of the book, so that the United Kingdom, with all its colonies, dependencies, and protectorates—down to Nyasaland and the last acquired isle in the Pacific—can now be studied as parts of one whole. After this, as Part II., come foreign countries, now rearranged in alphabetical order, without regard to their position on the surface of the globe. This plan may have some drawbacks, for it seems to place Germany on a level with Oman; but doubtless it is, on the whole, the least inconvenient. Advantage has been taken of this rearrangement to include, for the first time, a number of states hardly yet known to diplomacy, such as Oman above mentioned, and various tribes in Central Africa. Yet more, the facts and statistics given for each country have been freshly classified on a uniform plan, and new headings have been added. Finally, by means of a smaller type, the bulk of the volume has been kept very nearly the same, despite a considerable increase in the amount of information. When Mr. Keltie has done so much it would be unjust to pry for petty faults, but we venture to call his attention to the spelling of the proper names in the article on "Afghanistan" passim.

The Passion Play at Oberammergau. With the Whole Drama Translated into English and the Songs of the Chorus in German and English. By the author of "Charles Lowder." (W. H. Allen.)—The Ober-Ammergau Passion Play, 1890. By Mrs. Alec Tweedie. (Kegan Paul & Co.) When the passion play was last performed, English people were still somewhat excited by the general election of 1880. For this year's performance there are several improvements—a railway station at Oberan, nearer by half-a-dozen miles; an enlarged theatre; and the present volumes, together with other new publications. The representations begin in the last week of May, and continue till the end of September. The first of the books before us contains an interesting and descriptive introduction; a concise and valuable sketch, much more than a mere outline of the play; and, best of all, a translation of the drama and songs, together with much of the original text in German. The theatre is vast; the central portion, that which corresponds to the pit of ordinary theatres, is open to the sky and to the occasional obstruction of a highland rain. In these circumstances even those who have a fair acquaintance with German will find it a great advantage to have the words of the play in their native English. Josef Mayr, who for a third series of representations takes the chief part, an actor of singular grace and power, appears this year for the last time. Just now the village is ringing with the work of building temporary "hotels," which are really large wooden huts. Much speculation of other kind is going on, and there may be loss and disappointment if the season is damp and gloomy. Many ways lead to Munich, from which city of art galleries the by-railroad turns off to Oberammergau; but the most direct is by Antwerp and Cologne.—Mrs. Tweedie's book is less comprehensive and costly. It is a pleasant sketch of the whole procedure, with which the traveller to Oberammergau may beguile an hour or less of the somewhat tedious journey. The frontispiece gives a good notion of the picturesque situation of the village.
